TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-51, to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, June 7, 1988.

"SOME OF MY BEST FRIENDS DIDN'T LOOK LIKE ME"

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 7, I will call the attention of the Senate to the question, "Some of my best friends didn't look like me."

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGY

NEED FOR ROYAL COMMISSION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 9, 1988, I will draw the attention of the Senate to the need for a Royal Commission on Reproductive Technology.

QUESTION PERIOD

BRITISH COLUMBIA

SOUTH MORESBY—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK— BREAKDOWN IN NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I am most disturbed about the stories concerning the breakdown in the talks relating to setting aside South Moresby Island as a park. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate enlighten us as to what the real facts are behind this breakdown?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not sure I can add much to what my friend already knows.

A memorandum of agreement was signed last July by the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia containing a federal commitment of $106 million towards the establishment of a national park at South Moresby, including a $50 million regional development initiative for the Queen Charlotte Islands. At the moment there appears to be some reluctance on the part of the government of the province of British Columbia to follow through. As Mr. Mazankowski said recently, that government has had some second thoughts and we are now trying to resolve this matter as between the two governments.

Senator Marchand: Are talks going on now? As the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate also involved in those talks?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as in so many federal-provincial dossiers, I am not conducting these discussions personally, but I am aware that within the past 24 hours there have been contacts between representatives of the federal government and of the provincial government and those discussions are continuing.

Senator Marchand: Since I have a keen interest in this matter, would the minister be good enough to send me, at some point, a note on all the issues involved and just where they stand? I hope every effort is being made to set aside this beautiful piece of the world as a heritage site in a manner that would satisfy the needs of the Haida. Their concerns are of the utmost importance to me and to all Canadians.

Senator Murray: I will do what my honourable friend asks. As far as the Haida are concerned, he will be aware that discussions have been going on with them for many months and it is hoped that an understanding can be reached quite soon.

THE SENATE

FILLING OF VACANCIES—REASONS FOR DELAY

Hon. Azellus Denis: I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I read in yesterdays Globe and Mail that Mr. Mulroney is not in a hurry to fill the eight Senate vacancies. I note that, of those eight, six will require to be appointed from provinces with Liberal governments. Has the federal government any other reason for delaying those appointments than that suggested in the article to which I referred?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must say that I am not aware that the provincial governments in question have, in fact, submitted lists of nominees to the Prime Minister, as provided for in the political accord reached at Meech Lake. However, I can inquire about that matter.

Senator Denis: Is it not the duty of the federal government to ask the provincial governments to recommend names to fill those vacancies?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not aware that the political accord is precise on whether the federal government should formally request a list of nominees first, or whether the provinces can simply submit a list of nominees, as I would have thought would be the case. I trust we are not getting into the, "After you, my dear Alphonse!" routine.

There is nothing to prevent the provincial governments in question from submitting a list of nominees, with or without a formal request from the federal government. I shall make inquiries as to the status of this matter in respect of all the vacancies and see what information I can properly bring to the public's attention at this time.

Senator Denis: Please do.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question and ask Senator Murray, when he is doing his research, to find out whether a list has been submitted by the Premier of Nova Scotia?

Senator Murray: Yes, I shall do that, honourable senators. Indeed, my response was intended to indicate that I would look into the status of these vacancies in all provinces.

Hon. Charles McElman: Perhaps the minister would like to arrange with the provinces to add this as an additional prize in the Lotto 6/49 weekly draw!

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

STATUS OF AND STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO CANADIAN TRADE AMBASSADOR—GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT ACTION

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, two weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government to determine whether Mr. Simon Reisman is still a trade ambassador in the employ of the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): That very night I attended a meeting of the cabinet, and I found Ambassador Reisman at or near the table. I take it for granted that he is still on the payroll.

Senator LeBlanc: Are you sure he was not under the table?

Senator McElman: My honourable friend suggests that he may have been under the table.

Senator LeBlanc: Coaching Crosbie!

Senator Murray: Never! That would be a great injustice. He is a very temperate man.

Senator McElman: Then my ancillary question would be whether, having determined that, the government has made any attempt to put a leash on this gentleman to have him refrain from entering political debate at the national level?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I hope my friend and others are not unduly sensitive about remarks made by Ambassador Reisman in the course of his duties. He was the chief negotiator for Canada in the free trade negotiations. He clearly supports free trade. He feels, and justifiably so, that he has something of substance and importance to say to the Canadian people on the subject—

Senator LeBlanc: He always has.

Senator Murray: —as he did when he negotiated the Auto Pact with the United States for the then Government of Canada.

He has made comments about the role of the Senate, which, as I indicated the other day, I believe are only restatements of the obvious. He made what I thought were laudatory remarks about some people, in particular the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, when he described him as a "free-trader." Coming from Ambassador Reisman, that should be considered a compliment.

Senator Flynn: Beyond the call of duty!

Senator McElman: That falls somewhat short of the names that he has been called on occasion.

May I remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate that I do not disagree with what Mr. Reisman says when he speaks to the Free Trade Agreement as such, but I would remind him of the quotation I gave him two weeks ago taken from that impeccable journal, The Daily Gleaner of Fredericton, dated May 10, 1988.

Senator Murray: You did not always feel that way about it.

● (1410)

Senator McElman: It had another publisher at that time, Senator Murray, with whom both of us were acquainted.

I quote Simon Reisman. He said:

I shouldn't be trying to speak for the political people, (but)—

And then he went on, of course, to speak for the political people.

—I think the prime minister intends to put this agreement through the Parliament of Canada expeditiously and then go to the people. My advice is get the agreement in place and then go to the people.

That is a highly debatable intervention; it is given in a partisan fashion and has nothing to do with the man's role as a trade ambassador for Canada. So I simply ask: Has somebody made an attempt—it would probably be futile—to put a leash on the man and keep him out of the political arena?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think, first, that it is incorrect to characterize that advice as partisan.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Come on!

Senator Murray: What could be more normal than that an ambassador who has negotiated an historic Free Trade Agreement with the United States would want to see that agreement ratified by Parliament and implemented as expeditiously as possible? What could be more normal than his wanting to see that happen during the mandate of the present government? It does not seem to me to be correct to describe that as partisan advice. On the contrary, I would have thought that honourable senators and others would be pleased with the candour with which Ambassador Reisman is sharing with the general public his advice to the Prime Minister.

Senator McElman: Although I will not try to put too fine a point upon it, I suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that his views have changed immensely since he was in New Brunswick acting as an adviser to the government.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, may I ask the government leader why so many millions of dollars are spent in publicity that tries to show the advantages of this agreement while not one cent is spent in trying to show the disadvantages of it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Canada has a $200 billion trading relationship with the United States. It seems to me that a very small amount of money is being spent—and not in a partisan way—to sell the deal.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: First, the honourable senator can look at the purposes for which money has already been spent in this regard. It has been spent, for example, to print the Elements of the Agreement, a document which was tabled in this place and in the other place; money was also spent in distributing it across the country. To suggest that the campaign is going to take on a partisan cast is surely to anticipate a publicity campaign that is not yet launched. This is not a case of television commercials showing the flight of Canada geese.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT TREATMENT OF POLITICAL OR PARTISAN STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have one or two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does he wish to address to other members of the Public Service the advice that he gives regarding Ambassador Reisman? Is an intervention delivered in a political or partisan way by a public servant permissible only if it praises the government, or, as in the case of the president of the Public Service Alliance, is such an intervention considered to be out of line—as it was by the Prime Minister, at least—when it attacks the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it must be obvious to all that Ambassador Reisman is sui generis.

Senator Gigantès: He certainly is some sort of national resource.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have received documents which have been distributed by the office that Mr. Crosbie has now taken over. These documents, referring to information that is impartial, purport to give an independent view of what has been said in the media. However, in the whole of the documents there is no mention of the criticisms made by the Toronto Star—not one of the criticisms appears. In none of the documents have they quoted what Mr. McCain has been saying in Maclean's about the food processing industry—and this is not the first time he has said these things.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he insists that the documents that have been produced are impartial and fair. I would like him to say that on the record. I will then bring the documents in tomorrow.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I do not know whether the minister is going to answer. If he is not going to answer Senator Gigantès' question—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I have answered already.

Senator Olson: —I would like to ask him another question. How can the Leader of the Government justify this or suggest that this is non-partisan material, which will cost $10 million, when the minister responsible, the Honourable John Crosbie, has informed the Women's National Conservative Association that free trade is going to be an election issue? If he has said that, this then becomes Tory propaganda and nothing short of it. How does the Leader of the Government justify that kind of action, or is he denying that Mr. Crosbie, the minister responsible, has already made the announcement that free trade will be an election issue?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, election issues are not decided solely by the government or by the Progressive Conservative Party. I would think that my honourable friends opposite, if they can get their act together, might have something to say about that.

Senator Olson: If your honourable friends opposite got their act together and read some of your old speeches, they could make some most telling comments about the right stage at which the government can print things like this and call them public documents. The Leader of the Government used to argue that until they are passed by Parliament they are Tory or Liberal propaganda. You are trying to make that point, and that is the stage you are now at. If you like, I will dig up the chapter and verse of your own statements.

Senator Murray: My friend can dig up chapter and verse if he likes, but I would ask that he not rush to judgment. He should wait to see what the content of this public information campaign is before he rushes to condemn it as partisan.

Senator Olson: It is not I who am rushing; it is your own colleague, the minister responsible for it, who is. Mr. Crosbie has already said what he is going to do with the trade issue. He has said they are going to spend $10 million promoting the acceptance of the free trade deal. It seems to me that the minister should at least read his own propaganda.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MESSAGE FROM COMMONS AND MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Motion and Message relating to certain amendments to Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Copyright Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof), presented on Tuesday, May 31, 1988.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have spoken on this subject before, and I will not detain you for long this afternoon. I first spoke on this bill in this chamber some weeks ago when I was filled with a great deal of hope that we would move quickly to accept legislation that in my opinion seemed very much needed and too long in coming, many years having passed since we had seriously looked at the subject of copyright.

When I returned to this subject after it had been to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and the committee had presented its report, I came back with concern, alarm and almost with depression that the merits of the bill had been lost in a discussion of whether or not the timing was particularly propitious and whether or not we should wait until we had the second copyright bill which had been promised. I tried to give some shape to those concerns at that time.

The committee received the message from the other place, and since we last discussed it here the matter has been dealt with twice in the committee. At the first meeting it was agreed that we should be willing to see the minister at her earliest convenience if she was available so that we could pursue questions having to do with what had already occurred, or what might occur in the near future, by way of getting users and creators of copyright together to agree on how they should function under the bill. What we were searching for—what the chairman was searching for, certainly—was some reassurance that, if we did get on with the first half of the legislation, the second half would come shortly and would be received as a matter calling for some immediate agreement by the parties concerned.

I am overjoyed to be able to speak to you today and say that this assurance was forthcoming from the minister in a most affirmative way; that the existence of the legislation had been a spur to the people who are to be affected by it—that is, the users and the creators—and that they were meeting, had been meeting and would be meeting. The minister was convinced that most of the matters dealt with in Bill C-60 would be resolved and, what is more, she would, given the normal process of government activity, be ready with the second half of the legislation by September of this year.

It was with that reassurance from the minister that the members of the committee were willing to come to the agreement which you found yesterday in the report submitted to this chamber.

I will not read that report, but I will read its conclusion. It states:

The evidence presented by the Minister of Communications to the Committee indicated that progress has been made toward resolving outstanding issues between users and creators of copyright material. This includes agreement on most of the exceptions from copyright to be provided to users in stage two of copyright reform. The lack of information regarding such exceptions was cited by the majority of the Committee in its recommendation in its previous report regarding the postponement of the establishment of collectives.

In light of the Minister's evidence regarding agreement on copyright exceptions, and in view of the short time horizon before stage two is introduced, the Committee no longer feels that this postponement is necessary and therefore recommends that the Senate not insist on amendment 2 of its report on Bill C-60.

Further, given the commitment by the Minister to allow consultations between officials and artists and curators and museum managers to arrive at an agreed upon exhibition right for stage two of copyright reform, the Committee recommends that the Senate not insist on amendment 1 of its report on Bill C-60 which called for the deletion of clause 2 respecting exhibition rights.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to take very long in my comments on this particular committee report. Senator Doyle has said that he was joyful at the results of the committee meeting. I must say that I was surprised on being informed by Senator Doyle as he left the building on Friday that the committee had concluded in a mood of sweetness and light and had reached an agreement and that, therefore, the report which we have received today would be forthcoming. Honourable senators, I am pleased that that has occurred and that the dialogue that has taken place between the minister and the government, and the Senate and the standing committee, has resulted in this particular outcome.

I wanted to speak to the chairman myself about the committee deliberations on Friday. I found that he was in Ireland on Monday and was able to get in touch with him late on Monday—at least it was late for him, although not so late for me—and he certainly confirmed the substance of what Senator Doyle has placed before us today. I understand that consultations have taken place and will continue to take place between the interested parties. I understand that a number of exceptions have been identified and that further exceptions may be identified in future.

Moreover, I understand that the minister had given a definite undertaking that, all things being equal, the second phase would be proceeded with in the fall. Senator Sinclair certainly regarded this development as positive and of sufficient importance to agree that the report, which we have received today, should be forthcoming. Honourable senators, that certainly satisfied me and it has been strengthened by the report that Senator Doyle has given us today.

I can only congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee for having reached this result. I certainly am not as expert on this matter as are Senator Doyle and other members of the committee, but at least I can say that, as a result of their work, the consciousness and the understanding of the problem has certainly been increased among parliamentarians and, it is hoped, amongst the public also. I must say that I have a much better knowledge now than I had up to this point of the issues that are involved in this copyright legislation.

Therefore, honourable senators, I have no hesitation in agreeing that this matter be moved forward in the way recommended by the committee.

• (1430)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as a member of the committee, I have a few words following on those of my leader. In my opinion the action taken by the Senate committee was well worthwhile. Bill C-60 in its original presentation had some serious problems associated with it. Without going into those problems, which has been done very ably by Senator Doyle, I think it is important to remind ourselves and the country that, as a result of the actions of the Senate and the committee in determining the future of this bill, the whole process was speeded up in the sense that the creators and users of various copyrights were brought together. When you think of 490 museums that faced problems and all the educational institutions, the schools and libraries that had problems, I am sure you will agree that bringing together all the parties enabled the difficulties that had been created to be more readily resolved. As has been expressed, all of us are delighted that we have been able to speed up the process. I hope we end up with a bill on phase two that solves the problems associated with the original bill.

Before I close I should like to thank the minister for her very cooperative attitude toward the committee, which was responsible for the speed with which the difficulties were resolved. She was certainly receptive to what the committee put forth and encouraging in her attempt to meet the problems facing the bill and some of the suggestions of the committee.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on May 25, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Hébert).

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Order stands.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Senator Hébert, when will you speak on this agenda item?

Senator Hébert: Well, if you insist—

Senator Flynn: I will certainly insist next week.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: In due course, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Well, Senator Corbin, you too will have your turn to speak on this item.

Senator Corbin: In due course, Senator Flynn. Be patient! Order stands.

RAILWAY SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-105, An Act to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Turner).

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I now move into the nitty-gritty of Bill C-105. They tell me that it is the greatest bill since the introduction of sliced bread by Garfield Weston. Honourable senators will note that clause 10 of Bill C-105 contemplates that a railway must file with the minister certain materials to accompany the request for the minister's approval in respect of certain alterations, et cetera. For example, subclause 10(3) requires the minister to consider certain requests submitted for approval by the proposing parties and in some cases subparagraph 10(3)(b)(ii) requires the proposing parties to file further particulars in respect of the original application. In our respectful submission, it ought to be required that these further particulars be filed with any objecting parties that have already filed an objection, as contemplated by the other subclauses of clause 10.

Now, honourable senators, let us move to clause 18 in Part II, for which I requested copies of the rules and regulations last week. Paragraph 18(1)(c) says in part:

(1) The Governor in Council may make regulations . . .

(c) respecting the following matters, in so far as they relate to safe railway operations, in relation to persons employed in positions referred to in paragraph (b):

(i) the training of those persons, both before and after appointment to those positions,

Honourable senators, what does that mean? I presume it refers to the running crews, the engineer, the conductor, the trainman and the yard-man.

I wonder where they think we have been for 50 years. When you were hired on any railway, the old-timers taught you everything they knew, plus. If along the road you had to stop at a siding, the engineer would take the time to explain the various parts of the locomotive. At the end of one year you had to write a two- or three-day examination on the rules of operation and the parts of a locomotive. If you graduated up to second class, you would learn a little more about the locomotive, and then at the end of the second year you would have another two- or three-day examination. If you did not pass that, you were suspended. At the end of the third year you were given an examination on the rules.

Beginning in the days of the steam locomotive and continuing into the era of the diesel, you had to go to Toronto for that examination. You spent five days in the rule car on nothing but the locomotive, and then you spent five days on the rules. Those tests included an oral examination as well. You had to know the name of each part and how it worked, just like a doctor. You had to know what to do if such and such a part of the valve gear or the brake system broke down. You had to know what valves to cut out in order to proceed to the terminal, maybe at reduced speed, and to ensure that you still had a train and engine brake in order to stop in case of emergency.

If you failed to do the repair job correctly, you were summoned to the office and perhaps given 15 or 20 demerits. After you reached the level of 60 demerits, you were fired for two years. If your lack of knowledge was felt to be serious, you could be suspended immediately for six months, eight months or maybe a year. Even today, at the end of every three years there is a period where you have to go down to the rule car for an oral and written examination on the rules of the road. If you do not receive over 90 per cent, you are pulled out of service until you pass the examination.

Subparagraph 18(1)(c)(ii) reads:

hours of work and rest periods to be observed by those persons,

What does that mean? I presume that when you travel to another terminal you have to be given time to catch up on your sleep.

The Honourable John Crosbie received a letter on January 8, 1988, from the United Transportation Union local of London, Ontario. The letter reads as follows:

I have been instructed by the Local to make the following inquiry and request.

Now that Deregulation has been passed into law and it seems easier to get a license for a trucking company, the membership would like to know, where your Government will get the funds for road repairs. They are well aware that the trucks are the ones that cause the largest amount of damage to our highways. The present and future additions, widening and new highways seem to them to be basically for the benefit of the trucks.

The increase in trucking creates an increase in accidents, who is to be held responsible?

● (1440)

What if any, does you or your Government see in the future for safer travel, both for the public and the trucking industry on our highway system?

This Local would also like to request a full, final up to date copy of the Mandatory Rest Regulation, (the basic law and any supplements)

Your consideration to these matters will be greatly appreciated.

So interested was Mr. Crosbie in safety in the railways, honourable senators, that he never even answered this letter.

Under this bill automatic, minimal medical standards are to be met. Again, I sent a copy of the drug and alcohol testing guidelines to the boys in southwestern Ontario. Their reply is as follows:

After reviewing the material you sent me, over drug and alcohol testing and discussing it with several members of the Local, I have drawn the following conclusions.

1. The survey leaves a lot of doubt, as to its credibility.

2. One who likes an occasional drink, is now having his privacy invaded, let alone policed.

3. No mention of interview with Company officials in the survey, let alone the Minister of Transport's office and officers or the C.T.C. or R.T.C. or the Transport accident investigation board.

If we must live with it then let it also apply to Government members, all the way from Prime Minister down.

Honourable senators, I might mention that they all drink, too!

The letter goes on to state:

Reasoning, that these people have a greater control in decision making, which affects a larger number of citizens than an individual Railway employee. One must also remember, a person can be devastated in more than one way.

So in view of these items and what appears an easy way out for both Company and Government bodies, I decline the proposals placed forward by the whomevers.

I do believe we now have a system that seems to work satisfactory now.

The bill provides for the establishment of support programs for those persons and standards applicable to such programs. That means that, if you are caught drinking, you are enrolled in a course. Honourable senators, we believe in that sort of approach, but why should we single out a separate group of workers? If this sort of support program is to be provided to railway employees, then why should we not include airline and bus employees?

Honourable senators, I am also concerned as to the powers given to certain individuals under the proposed bill. For example, under the provisions of subclause 28(3), paragraph (c), railway safety inspectors are given the power to seize property. In my view that provision is open-ended in that it does not afford the affected person any reasonable protection in accordance with similar general protections in Canadian law.

Subclause 31(6) of the proposed act requires a railway safety inspector to provide a railway company and its supervisors with notice as to equipment not to be used or operated—for example, defective equipment—except under specified terms and conditions. There is no corresponding requirement for the railway safety inspector to provide the employees affected by such defective equipment, or their organization, with any notice of the order issued by the railway safety inspector.

I would submit that it is appropriate that this provision be amended to require that employees, who may have to operate such defective equipment or equipment under very strict terms and conditions, and their organizations, such as trade unions, receive copies of all such notices. In my view such a requirement would be in accordance with the safety provisions set out in the Canada Labour Code.

Honourable senators, the following questions come to mind: Who will the railway safety inspectors be? Where will they come from? What training and how many years of railway experience will they have had? How many inspectors will be hired? Will they be off the street—say, firemen or policemen? What city or railway terminals will they operate out of? Will the inspectors be on call 24 hours a day like railwaymen, or subject to call if they are working a spare board? These are questions that we need to have answered, and no doubt we will receive these answers when this bill is referred to committee.

Under clause 32 the minister is required to provide notice of orders concerning unauthorized or improperly maintained works to the railway company responsible for such work and to make any necessary orders that he deems appropriate. Once again, it is the minister who must give notice when he is of the opinion that such a railway company has contravened any regulations under this proposed act.

It is my submission that it is only fair and appropriate that employees and their respective organizations receive notice of such orders and that they be kept fully apprised of the developments throughout the process, since the employees actually operate such equipment.

Under clause 33 of the bill the minister has the power to make emergency directives and forward such to the railway company in question in respect of certain practices of the company.

Again, I would submit that the employees and their organizations have an equal right to be made aware of dangerous conditions existing on the railway, of questionable practices by their employer and of any orders issued by the minister in that respect. Furthermore, I submit that there should be an obligation on behalf of the railway company to notify its employees and trade unions of any dangerous conditions, commodities or practices as determined by the minister and the effect of such on the employment of persons who might be affected.

In the olden days, if a railway employee discovered a rough section of track, he would report the situation at the first available station or at the terminal. The dispatcher would then send sectionmen out to do the necessary repair work. In those days there was safety.

Honourable senators, clause 35 mandates physicians or optometrists to disclose potentially hazardous conditions of certain employees critical to railways operations. I harbour no illusions that our members, being from the running trades and involved in the actual operations of the railway system, may, in fact, come under such designated positions.

In my view such physicians or optometrists ought to be independent of the railway companies. In terms of the requirement to report such conditions to the chief medical officer of the railway company concerned, I submit that it would be preferable that such information be forwarded to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as a more neutral and independent party.

There is concern about the use to be made of the confidential information between a patient and his doctor, which may be released by a patient's physician in accordance with the requirements set out under clause 35 of the bill. Why should a physician be allowed to release information to the company? Undoubtedly the doctor-patient relationship would suffer.

I believe there is potential for abuse in this requirement as set out under the aforementioned clause.

Subclause 35(3) states:

A railway company may make such use of any information provided pursuant to subsection (1) as it considers necessary in the interests of safe railway operations.

Subclause 35(1) makes it a duty of a physician or optometrist to report any condition of a private patient who is a designated employee that is likely to pose a threat to railway operations by notice sent to the chief medical officer of the employing railway company. The association is not comfortable with the concept of legislation that interferes with an employee's confidential relationship with a private physician or optometrist. There is, however, a longstanding precedent, in the interests of public safety, in the airline industry. Our association strongly objects to the provisions of subclause 35(5), which makes medical and optometric information privileged information for disciplinary purposes.

Every three years an employee has to undergo a strict medical examination. If that employee has booked off sick for a week or two, the company has the right to send that employee to the CNR doctor; if the doctor is not satisfied, that employee is sent to a specialist. That employee is not permitted to work until the report from the doctor or specialist has been received. If the company is not satisfied with that, it has the right to send the employee to a medical CNR clinic. Why does the government want to put excess baggage into this bill?

Subclause 35(3) permits the railway company to use the medical or optometric information as the railway company considers necessary in the interests of safe railway operations. This, in practice, could be in the form of demotion or dismissal. Demotion and dismissal are both situations subject to the grievance procedures contained in all railway collective agreements with the railway unions. Subclause 35(5) makes the medical information privileged and specifically states that the information so provided by the physician or optometrist shall not be used in any proceedings, including disciplinary matters. In fact, none of the provisions of this clause of the bill provide for advice or notice to the employee by the physician or optometrist or the medical officer of the railway company of the medical or visual condition which may be used by the railway company for demotion or dismissal.

Pursuant to that clause, an employee could be advised by a railway company that he had been demoted or dismissed for alleged safety reasons, based on medical or visual grounds, without ever being given the specific information on which the demotion or dismissal was based. Is this Canadian law?

The grievance procedure and any subsequent arbitration process would also be frustrated by the privileged information status created by subclause 35(5) of the bill. Our association submits that this is a completely unacceptable provision. The employee would be deprived of his right to a fair hearing and the basic tenets of natural, Canadian justice. In fact, subclause 35(5) strictly construed would prevent an employee from using the information in his defence in a disciplinary proceeding for demotion or dismissal, even if he were in possession of the information, since the subclause states "and the information so provided shall not be used in any such proceedings." Even a person taken to court is allowed to defend himself!

The Canadian Railway Labour Association can reluctantly accept that, to ensure the highest degree of public and employee safety of railway operations, a medical or visual condition that could result in public risk should be corrected as soon as detected, even if it means, as proposed by the legislation, an exception to patient-doctor confidentiality. However, there must be adequate safeguards to protect railway employees from mistake or abuse. The right to know and the right to due process provided by the grievance procedure and arbitration in the collective agreement cannot be avoided by legislating as privileged the information on which demotion or dismissal is based. An employee has a right to know specifically why he is being demoted or dismissed. There can be no more basic right in our system of justice.

In our view, if a railway employee in a designated position— for safety reasons—on the basis of a medical condition or visual deficiency is unfortunately unable to meet the required standard as set out by the regulation to perform his duties safely, then clearly some action must be taken by the railway in the interests of public safety. There is, however, no need to proceed in a clandestine manner. If the facts support the action, there is no reason why the facts should not be disclosed, and, if necessary, tested by the normal collective agreement provisions.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association requests that the committee recommend amendments to clause 35 of the proposed act as follows:

- (1) to provide that when a Physician or Optometrist sends a notice to the Chief Medical Officer of the Railway the employee be so advised and be given a copy of the notice sent to the Chief Medical Officer of the railway.

We thank the minister for accepting that amendment.

Clause 39 appears to define an "authorized search" in very wide and ambiguous terms. In our respectful submission, this clause is much too general and appears to provide too much power and not enough protection of the rights of the individual employees. The union is very concerned about the sweeping powers and the harsh provisions set out in the offences clause of Bill C-105, clause 41. In our view this clause of the bill, vis-à-vis employees of the railway companies, raises the possibility of elevating employment misconduct and offences to the level of offences under the Criminal Code of our country with the applicable criminal sanctions. This is an unprecedented and unwarranted intrusion into the employment relationship of the railway companies and their employees. We wish to emphasize the simple and undisputed fact that there is a dearth of substantial evidence to justify these draconian provisions.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association is opposed to the principle on which this clause is based. Mandated fines and prison sentences for railway employees who contravene regulations, orders, directives or rules is unnecessary, harsh, counter-productive and impractical. Why now, after 100 years?

The proposed legislation will permit the railways, either by the rule-making process or simply by reference, to introduce rules which only by degree are relevant to the safe operation of the railways. As we understand it, these rules, when incorporated by reference pursuant to the Railway Safety Act, will have the same force as a regulation. In addition, clause 46 of the bill exempts almost all orders, rules, et cetera, including rules introduced by the railways and incorporated by reference, from the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act.

The legislation mandates fines and prison sentences for employees on conviction of any violation of these, in many cases, company rules. A minor company rule vaguely linked to safety can be given the force of law by incorporation by reference pursuant to clause 48, without being examined pursuant to the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act. Our association finds this aspect of the legislation completely unacceptable.

It may be that the broad scope of clause 46 of the legislation—which deems the various regulations, orders and rules incorporated by reference to be statutory instruments for the purposes of the Statutory Instruments Act—is improper. The Statutory Instruments Act is a basic piece of legislation enacted for a specific purpose. That purpose, in our opinion, should not and cannot be obviated by the legislative drafting mechanism of “deeming a variety of regulations, directives, orders, et cetera, to be de facto statutory instruments.” The basic intent of a statute of Parliament cannot be avoided by another statute by this simple drafting mechanism. The Canadian Railway Labour Association asks the Senate to investigate the legality and propriety of this aspect of the legislation.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association strongly recommends that the longstanding practice of enforcing the rules by the disciplinary procedures available in the normal employer-employee relationship be maintained. The addition of possible monetary fines and prison sentences proposed by the legislation for rule violations places railway employees in a double jeopardy situation. An employee will not only be disciplined by the railway or lose his employment for a rule violation, he will now also be subject to prosecution. In our opinion this is unnecessary and draconian and should be corrected by the Senate.

The situation will be further exacerbated, since there is no provision in the legislation to protect a railway employee who brings an unsafe practice or a possible rule violation to the attention of his supervisor if the supervisor chooses to ignore the advice or orders the employee to continue with his duties in violation of the rule or unsafe condition. The employee is placed in a catch-22 situation. If the employee disobeys the instructions of his supervisor, he can be suspended and disciplined for insubordination—the arbitral concept of “obey and grieve later.” If the employee, on the other hand, continues the unsafe practice or rule violation, he is subject to criminal prosecution. This could result in a monetary fine or even a prison sentence, pursuant to the Railway Safety Act. This is not only an unjust situation but one which, in the long term, is not conducive to operating efficiency or safety. The Canadian Railway Labour Association urges the Senate to examine this aspect of the legislation very closely and to introduce the necessary amendments.

Our recommendation is that monetary fines and imprisonment should, if required in the legislation at all, be strictly confined to convictions as a result of violations covered by the Criminal Code. We are not convinced that monetary fines constitute an effective way to ensure that the railways conform to the regulations and enforce an acceptable level of safety. If monetary fines are too low, then it could become more economical, in the long term, for the railways simply to pay the fine, when a violation is discovered, than to invest the capital on the technological devices or operational procedures required to ensure an acceptable level of safety. All of the employees think of safety now—they have done that for 100 years. I do not know why we need legislation like this.

Obviously, the government is convinced that railway safety can be ensured by the threat of monetary fines as a deterrent. In our opinion, based on this approach to railway safety, the fines proposed by the legislation for violation by the railways are not large enough to achieve the deterrent envisaged. Our association will leave it to the judgment of the Senate to decide what level of monetary fine for violations of the railway will prove to be an effective deterrent. In our opinion it is a judgment call.

We note that subclause 41(6) seems to contemplate an employee's being responsible for all reasonable costs and charges in the event that such employee is convicted of an offence that really could amount to no more than inadvertence or negligence on behalf of an employee in his everyday employment responsibilities. The logical extension of such a provision would place each and every employee of the railway companies in jeopardy of being responsible for the massive costs that are involved in almost any railway incident or accident, however minor. An employee could end up losing his home and his life savings and be placed in debt for the rest of his life as a result of a simple error in judgment while performing his everyday employment duties. Such a possibility is, once again, unprecedented and unique in our labour relations and criminal law.

Clause 44 speaks to the establishment and composition of the Railway Safety Consultative Committee. In our view it is simply inequitable and indefensible to limit the participation of the representatives of the employees of the railway companies of this country to only three members on that committee.

We believe that the above-noted deficiency is compounded even further in clause 50 of the bill, wherein, although the minister is required to establish a committee to conduct a comprehensive review of the operation of this act within the next five years, there is no guarantee whatsoever that such a committee will even include at least one representative of the employees, their trade unions or the Canadian Railway Labour Association. Surely, at the very least, there ought to be some input from the Canadian Railway Labour Association if any comprehensive review of the legislation is undertaken.

At the present time there is in place a tripartite Rail Safety Advisory Committee to the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. Upon the abolition of the Canadian Transport Commission on January 1, 1988, this advisory committee was kept in place by the new transportation agency. The Rail Safety Advisory Committee was established as a result of the general safety inquiry conducted by the Railway Transport Committee in the late 1970s. A recommendation of this inquiry was that a working advisory committee be established with one representative from the railways, the unions, the Canadian Railway Labour Association and the commission staff, on a tripartite basis. This group was to be chaired by a commissioner of the Railway Transport Committee.

The group was established and called the Rail Safety Advisory Committee. As we understand it, this advisory committee is now chaired, on an interim basis until the Railway Safety Act is in place, by a director general of the National Transportation Agency. The function of the Rail Safety Advisory Committee is to examine proposed new or revised safety regulations before they are introduced to ensure input from all of the parties involved with the safety regulations on a day-to-day basis.

The Rail Safety Advisory Committee is supported by technical working groups that are also made up on a tripartite basis. The proposed new or revised regulations are directed by the Rail Safety Advisory Committee to specific working groups for examination by representatives from the railways, the railway unions and the commission staff, who have specialized knowledge in the particular areas of railway operation dealt with by the proposed new or amended regulations. It is in these working groups that the individual senior officers of the respective railway unions have their input, and they are experienced men, many with 25, 30 and 35 years' service.

● (1510)

The United Transportation Union and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers are represented by senior officers in the working group that deals with specific regulations involving the employees they represent. The Signal and Communications Union and the Maintenance of Way Employees Union are similarly represented in a working group that deals with specific regulations involving the employees they represent. The Brotherhood of Railway Carmen is represented in a working group that deals with regulations pertaining to equipment maintenance and inspection. Following this process, the revised regulations are reported back to the Rail Safety Advisory Committee, with any disagreements or unresolved matters as a result of discussion in the working groups, for final resolution.

The object of the exercise is to ensure that there is adequate input from the various unions that represent the employees who must work under the regulations, and the railways that must comply with the regulations, before the regulations are actually put into place by the regulatory body.

All railway unions involved in this process are members of the Canadian Railway Labour Association, which acts as a coordinating body between the railways and the regulatory body. The railway unions, the railway companies and the regulatory body, based on over ten years' experience, have found this process meaningful and very productive. We have had reasonable assurance that the Rail Safety Advisory Committee process and the working groups will be continued when the new Railway Safety Act comes into effect. However, we want to make sure.

The Rail Safety Advisory Committee, in our opinion, does not serve the same purpose as that contemplated by the proposed Railway Safety Consultative Committee, as outlined in section 44 of the proposed Railway Safety Act. Our association would not support replacement of the Rail Safety Advisory Committee by the proposed Railway Safety Consultative Committee since, in our view, they serve two different and distinct purposes.

As we understand the proposed consultative committee, it will serve a broad and general purpose. The function of the consultative committee will be to monitor the general operations of the Railway Safety Act from the railways', the users' and the railway unions' point of view to ensure that the future changes and methods in operations are discussed and brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport, to enable his office to keep the legislation current by amendment, if required.

A serious omission in the consideration of the proposed consultative committee was that there were no representatives from public interest groups. However, I understand that has been corrected. In addition, although the Canadian Railway Labour Association, as already stated, is comprised of, and under the policy direction of, the senior officers of the railway unions that represent the employees covered by the Railway Safety Act, one nominee from the Canadian Railway Labour Association is not sufficiently representative of the railway unions. A more balanced railway labour input would be achieved if the representation was expanded to three. I have heard that they will agree with this.

Our association would certainly recommend an amendment to clause 44 of the proposed legislation to this effect. We would also recommend an amendment to clause 44 to include a nomination from a public interest group. Subclause 44(8) states that one member is to represent the public. The questions that arise are: What group of the public, and where does this member come from?

Clause 1 states that there ought to be three members representing organized labour, two of whom shall represent the Canadian Railway Labour Association. Once again, the question that arises is: What group of the organized railway labour unions would this third member be from?

We are concerned with clauses 55 to 59, dealing with the Criminal Code. The proposed amendments are to the existing sections of the Criminal Code applicable to the operation of motor vehicles, aircraft and vessels. The objective is to extend the provisions of these sections of the Code to cover the operation of railway equipment that moves over the rails of the respective railways under federal jurisdiction.

Our association understands that the reason railway equipment has not been included in these sections of the Code is that, unlike motor vehicles, aircraft and vessels, railway equipment operates over a private right-of-way owned by the particular railway company. The only occasions when railway equipment touches private highways and large or small roads is at railway crossings, which are protected by various levels of protective devices according to the particular requirements of the crossing.

In our opinion nothing has changed that would justify the proposed changes to the Criminal Code to include railway equipment. Therefore, we are unable to understand the rationale for the proposed amendments to the Code. The railway system will not become any safer than it is now by the proposed amendments to the Code unless the amendments are based on the simplistic argument that if motor vehicles, aircraft and vessels are covered by the Code, then why not railway equipment? Our association cannot accept this as sufficient justification for the amendments.

The number of crossing accidents that result from railway equipment failure or human error on the part of a railway employee have been negligible in the history of modern railroading. There may have been crossing accidents as a result of the installation of inadequate protective devices at a particular crossing. This, however, will not be corrected by the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code.

According to the Department of Transport, in the five years from 1983 to 1987 there were 1,318 derailments across the country, 423 collisions and 3,437 crossing accidents, resulting in 361 deaths.

During my 27 and a half years of railway experience I was involved in 15 crossing accidents, where seven people lost their lives. People are killed trying to race the train to the crossing. A young gentleman, while going to the market in Windsor, played with us for two and a half years. One morning, I am sorry to say, we nailed him; it was too late. While going over the railway crossing he took his time and did not make it.

We must look at the reasons why there have been so many accidents. There are thousands of level crossings in Canada. If we were to look at eliminating one crossing and replacing it with a subway, the cost would be between $5 million and $10 million. Another reason there are so many accidents is that perhaps the oldtimers are now retired or have passed on. These were men with 35, 40 or 45 years' experience, who, from practical experience and know-how, knew what to look for in heavy fogs, rainstorms or snowstorms. If you cannot see the road, then you must know the number of road crossings, the sounds of the rails when you cross the bridges, and the glimpse of the farmhouses you have passed. We were told by the oldtimers that these were the landmarks to look for. I must say if you are travelling at 85 miles per hour in a heavy fog or a snowstorm, and you are on a single track and have to meet a passenger train somewhere, you get a sinking feeling when you look for a farmhouse and it is not there. Therefore, experience is a great teacher.

Another good, solid reason for the number of derailments and accidents is the fact that the railways have reduced and cut back their expenditures for maintenance equipment and trackage. Because of government decisions to deregulate railway and truck transportation, it is increasingly difficult to compete with the Americans in shipping. Therefore, the railway companies, like any other companies, continue to keep the volume of traffic they have had in the past. They will try to compete by cutting back on the maintenance of their equipment and tracks. We will see more accidents, possibly more collisions, and more derailments because of cutbacks. The section men and the carmen are the bloodline of safety of all railways, yet we cut them back.

We all remember when railway crossing arms at all railway crossings had signs that clearly stated: "Stop, look and listen." In the interval of trying to raise the millions of dollars to eliminate railway crossings, why not convert all road crossings to stop streets? Doesn't that make sense? Seldom do you hear of a bus being hit at a crossing. Why? Because they stop and look both ways before they cross over. That is safety, in my opinion.

All Voyageur and Greyhound buses stop at all road crossings. Honourable senators, adopting that practice would save hundreds of lives and millions of dollars in broken equipment.

The only way to improve this situation—if you want to spend the money—is to eliminate all grade separation crossings in Canada, which is costly, or to continue to upgrade the protective devices.

We strongly recommend to the committee that the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code to include railway equipment be deleted on the basis that they are unnecessary and not justified either by sound reasoning or by evidence that would support the amendments on the basis of increasing rail safety.

Clause 58 of the bill seems to contemplate that any person involved in any manner whatsoever with the operation of railway equipment, and who is thereafter determined to be impaired by virtue of alcohol or a drug, is guilty of an offence under section 237 of the Criminal Code and may thereafter face the loss of his or her licence, or face some other penal measure related to such impairment. It is to be noted that this clause itself does not in any way attempt to distinguish between those actually involved in the operation of the train—for example, the locomotive engineer who is responsible for the actual power motor operation of the train—and the score of other individuals whose responsibilities only tangentially touch upon the operation, such as baggagemen, maintenance-of-way forces, and so on.

Clause 61 also seems to refer to the possibility of an individual employee's losing his right or licence to operate railway equipment in the event he is found guilty of an offence under section 237 or section 238 of the Criminal Code. Because of the harsh operation of this clause, it could result in an employee's losing his right to earn a living and support his family. At the present time, if a citizen of this great country that we call Canada is found guilty of an offence under section 237 or 238 of the Criminal Code, he or she may lose his or her driver's licence, but only rarely does that mean that the individual loses employment prospects.

When I first went on the railway in 1941, the rule was: "Using intoxicants or frequenting places where they are sold is instant cause for dismissal." That was plain. I knew what could happen if I went into a hotel—they could fire me. Under a revision of the operating rules in 1962, that rule was changed to: "The use of intoxicants or narcotics by employees subject to duty, or their possession or use while on duty, is prohibited."

I asked the president of the CNR, and the general manager and the vice-president, "What does 'subject to call' mean? Is it six hours, eight hours, ten hours or twelve hours?" I am not a medical person, but if you go for a medical do not drink beer, wine or liquor for at least 24 hours before you have the examination, because it will show in your blood stream.

In 1987 Mr. D.L. Fletcher, senior vice-president of operations of the CNR, once again issued a new General Rule G. It states:

In addition to the requirements of this rule, employees must adhere to the following:

This is in addition to the others.

Employees must not use any drugs or medication while on duty or subject to duty which may produce drowsiness or any condition affecting their ability to work safely. It is the responsibility of the employee to know and understand the possible effects of any medication or drug prescribed or chosen for use.

Being under the influence of intoxicants, alcoholic beverages or narcotics while on duty, or subject to duty is prohibited.

Say that you have the flu or pneumonia and you are off work for four or five days. You go to the doctor and he puts you on medicine, such as tetracycline, which you take for ten days. If you go back to work on your six-to-eight shift, what happens? The drug will show in your blood. If they test you, they have you.

Clauses 59 and 60 clearly contemplate the use of breathalyzer tests, if so ordered by a peace officer, which would include a railway policeman. The range of railway employees subject to this provision is broad and all-encompassing. Our association cannot see the justification of this requirement. In our opinion there are adequate powers now to deal with the problem of alcohol abuse, which are to be further reinforced by the drug and alcohol testing provisions contained in section 18(1) of the proposed Railway Safety Act. It would appear that the government's approach to any problem is punitive. There has been absolutely no evidence of an abuse of alcohol by railway employees to a degree that would justify the proposed extensive amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada.

A review of all major and minor railway accidents in Canada over the past 20 years or more shows that few, if any, were discovered to be the result of the abuse of alcohol.

A recent survey conducted by the Minister of Transport of various groups of railway employees clearly indicated that the problem of alcohol abuse is minimal and that they are no better or worse than the rest of the population of Canada—according to a comparison-of-population study on the use of alcohol conducted by Health and Welfare Canada. The minor problem of alcohol and drug abuse in the railway industry can be resolved and controlled by methods less draconian than the Criminal Code. The major weapon to fight the problem is effective, joint, union-management employee-assistance programs. We believe in such programs. They worked very well in the old Michigan Central Railway. Our association, and all railroads, will have more to say on this subject later, when we appear before the Transport Committee.

• (1530)

Mr. Justice Foisy's investigation of the Hinton collision stated:

No CN or Via employee involved in the collision was under the influence of alcohol or drugs at the time.

He did point out, however, that the man had only had a few hours' rest. What happens when war breaks out? There are only a few men to work on the railway. When the boss calls you on the telephone and says: "Are you coming to work or do you want me to suspend you?", you then have a decision to make. You are presented with an appearance sheet which says that you know the road you will travel over, that you have had sufficient rest and that there are no alcoholic beverages in your system. You then sign that appearance sheet.

During the war we were gone seven days a week, either 30 or 31 days a month. We were never at home. All I saw of my children at that time was the occasional look at them as they lay in their cribs. I remember on one occasion the boss called and asked me if I intended to go to work. I said I had been away for four days, that I would go to work, but that I refused to sign the appearance sheet. I then went to Owen Sound, and when I came back two days later I found someone had signed my name to the sheet. That is how the work was performed during and after the war.

For 15 years I worked on the CNR. I never had a day off and we did not have holidays in those days. We had to go on strike in order to get seven days' holiday. The first year that we were given a week's holiday another chap and I went around to see how the oldtimers were taking it. They did not know what to do with themselves. That first year they worked the week and collected their holiday pay as well. The second year we put the heat on and said to them: "There is no point in having a week's holiday if you don't go away on holiday." The next year when we went around they were sitting on the veranda. They did not know what to do with themselves. Those oldtimers had worked 40 or 45 years without a holiday. This was a new thing to their system and they did not understand what it was all about.

Honourable senators, clauses 93 and 95 of the proposed bill appear to suggest that the company or commission may make bylaws subject to the provisions of the legislation that would thereafter become law under the force of the legislation. In our respectful submission, this seems to suggest that the railway companies would become self-regulators of the railway system, similar to the system utilized in the United States. This, again in our respectful submission, is quite apart from the history, public policy and best interests of Canadians, in terms of the safety of railway operations across our country. After all, from even a cursory review of the reports of the Grange or Foisy commissions it is quite evident that the railway companies have failed time and time again to put into effect, on their own initiative, adequate safeguards to guarantee the most optimum safety conditions in their operations of our railway systems. We respectfully submit that the railway companies have demonstrated in the past that they cannot be relied upon to self-regulate their operations adequately in respect of the very important area of railway safety.

History has shown that even the Canadian Transport Commission has had difficulty in either persuading or ordering the railway companies to promote or adequately introduce safe practices and technology in the most timely fashion. In our respectful submission, it will become much more difficult in this current era of deregulation to persuade the railway companies to regulate their operations in the most optimal manner in the very important area of railway safety. After all, the ultimate objective of Bill C-105 is to ensure the safe operation of the railways across our nation.

At the time of the wreck in Mississauga, I sat in opposition in the House of Commons. At that time I asked the now Deputy Prime Minister whether the train had been inspected on both sides when it went over the road crossing at Quebec Street, and he was not sure. I received good, reliable information that, of the two carmen who were supposed to be there to protect and inspect the train, one had had to go to Windsor because they were short a carman in Windsor. He had left the train before it arrived at and crossed over the crossing at Quebec. That particular carman had gone to the CNR and had gone "dead-end" to Windsor. Therefore, the Mississauga wreck could have been prevented if we had had that extra crew member inspector look at the train.

Honourable senators, I have tried to bring to your attention the concerns of the 60,000 workers employed by the three major railway companies and a number of smaller, short-line railways which operate freight or passenger trains from coast to coast in Canada.

At the report stage on third reading I hope to speak on railway employee stress as a safety factor, on employee assistance programs and on the subject of mandatory testing of employees and prospective employees for the use of drugs.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Spivak speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I commend this bill to you for second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Spivak, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved second reading of Bill C-117, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill provides for parliamentary approval of the proposed changes in federal sales tax and excise tax announced by the Minister of Finance in the budgets of February 18, 1987 and February 10, 1988, in the White Paper on Tax Reform of June 18, 1987 and in the tax reform document of December 16, 1987. Thus, the bill contains a number of important tax measures. However, I may point out that the increases in sales and excise tax provided under this legislation are part of the general tax reform program which will lead to very substantial reductions in personal income tax, totalling $12 billion over the next five years.

Obviously, no government likes to raise taxes. This bill clearly reflects the present government's commitment to better and equitable management of government operations and public resources. Overhead costs and operating and maintenance expenditures have been cut back over the past few years. Management of public finances has been improved. In this respect, the bill provides for accelerated remittance by taxpayers of federal sales and excise tax. This measure will offset the impact of transitional tax reform measures on revenues by guaranteeing a one-time increase in revenue of $1.6 billion.

The main sources of additional revenue provided under the proposed legislation are as follows.

First, a 10 per cent tax on telecommunications services, such as telephone and telex services, with the exception of service charges for local residential telephone lines. The tax on telecommunication services was announced in the June 1987 White Paper as a transitional measure, pending phase two of the sales tax reform.

Second, an increase in the tax on cable and pay television services, from 8 per cent to 10 per cent.

Third, an increase in the sales tax on paint and wallpaper from 8 per cent to 12 per cent.

Fourth, extension of the federal sales tax to a limited range of snack foods that compete with similar products that are currently taxed.

Fifth, an increase in the federal sales tax on beer, spirits, wine and tobacco products, from 15 per cent to 18 per cent.

Sixth, a 4 per cent increase in excise tax on tobacco products. This was, of course, well before the two bills adopted by the House of Commons on third reading yesterday had materialized.

Seventh, an increase in the air transportation tax of $4 per ticket, to recover a greater proportion of the cost of the air transport program.

Eighth, a one-cent per litre increase in the excise tax on gasoline and aviation fuel.

These budgetary measures are expected to raise annual revenues of over $1.5 billion. They are needed in order to reduce personal income tax as announced in the documents on tax reform and to enable the government to continue its efforts to reduce the deficit. The increase in the sales tax on alcohol and tobacco announced last December is necessary to finance improvements in the tax reform program, especially the increases in child tax credits.

The bill also provides for a number of technical changes in the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

The tax on motive fuels has been shifted to the manufacturer's level to resolve problems with administration and compliance.

The provisions on the refundable sales tax credit as it applies to certified institutions have been further refined to ensure that tax relief is restricted to non-profit organizations and to extend the exemption to goods purchased by organizations that provide administrative services solely to certified institutions.

A number of compliance provisions in the Excise Act have been revised to allow for the reduction in on-the-spot verification by excise officers of the manufacture of alcoholic beverages and tobacco products.

An important measure that I must draw to the Senate's attention is the proposed change to the fair pricing provisions of Section 34 of the Excise Tax Act. A recent decision of the Federal Court has called into question the power of the Minister of National Revenue to determine the value of a product for the purposes of sales tax when the taxpayer is not dealing with his customer at arm's length. The result has been a significant drop in sales tax revenue, since taxpayers reorganize their affairs to take advantage of this decision. The suggested amendment will make the tax apply to a "reasonable selling price" in transactions where the parties are not dealing at arm's length.

This change as well as the measures related to marketing and distribution charges, which will be the subject of another bill, should deal effectively with the problem of value for the purposes of sales tax until implementation of the second phase of consumption tax reform.

Another related temporary measure is the shifting of the tax to the wholesale level for such products as candy and snack food, pet litter and pet food, and some electronic equipment. For most of these items, the tax will be applied at the manufacturer's level once the proposal to deduct marketing and distribution costs is implemented.

Honourable senators, there are some tax breaks, some bright sides to this Bill. It contains measures to ease the paperwork burden on small businesses; more specifically, the ceiling for periodic and seasonal tax payments has been doubled. This change will allow some 2,000 taxpayers to pay their taxes on a quarterly, half-yearly or seasonal basis, rather than every month.

In answer to the concerns raised by the cultural community, original prints have been exempted from the federal sales tax.

Although this bill provides for an increase in the excise tax on gasoline, the fuel tax refund now given to primary producers will be increased by an equivalent amount. Therefore, the financial assistance given to farmers, fishermen, forestry workers and mine operators for their fuel costs will be maintained.

Although manufacturers generally pass on the tax increase on fuel sold after April 1 to farmers and other primary producers, the Minister of National Revenue does not have the authority to refund this tax increase to primary producers when they apply for a tax refund or when a registered seller made the refund directly to the primary producer. Therefore, this bill must be considered and approved with the least delay so that these tax refund applications can be paid as soon as possible.

Honourable senators, I conclude by reiterating that this is an important bill. All these measures which it enforces were announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget or by way of the other decisions I have already mentioned. It raises substantial new revenues by broadening the base of the tax system to include telecommunication services and increasing the tax rates for a number of goods and services. It is an important facet of the government's commitment to reduce the deficit and to balance the system by cutting personal income tax rates and increasing child care benefits in the Income Tax Act.

If and when this bill receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the sponsor of Bill C-117. Senator Flynn listed the industries and manufacturers which are likely to be affected by this bill. I am not sure whether the printing industry is included in the bill or whether it has been set aside for the time being, in view of the fact that it is already subject to a tax rate of 12 per cent.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I can provide Senator Leblanc with this information. I suggest it will be possible to provide him with a satisfactory answer as soon as the committee deals with this bill. At any rate, I take his question as notice and I hope I can provide him with this answer as soon as this bill has received second reading.

Senator Leblanc: Thank you, honourable senator.

[English]

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: In his discourse Senator Flynn mentioned the increases in revenue that would result from the passage of this legislation, and, if I understood him correctly, he used a figure of $12 billion over a period of five years.

Senator Flynn: Yes. I used the figure of $1.5 billion in additional revenues. The figure of $12 billion refers to the improvement in the income tax provisions under tax reform. So far as the additional moneys are concerned, the figure is $1.5 billion yearly. According to the figures with which I have been furnished, the reductions that will flow from the tax reform measures will amount to $12 billion in the next five years.

Senator Hicks: If revenue is increased by $1.5 billion a year in five years, that will produce an extra $7.5 billion. If the income tax taking is decreased by $12 billion, I do not see how the government can have collected any money that will enable the deficit to be reduced.

Senator Flynn: That does not mean that there will not be increases in the revenues due to other factors and a change in the rate. I do not know how these figures were arrived at, but I doubt that they cannot be reconciled, because over the years changes may bring in additional revenues with the same rate of tax, or a decrease in expenses may result from further measures taken to reduce expenses.

Senator Hicks: I understand that. I suppose what I am really questioning is the validity of Senator Flynn's argument, in which he tied the increased taxes to a reduction in income tax and said that this legislation would have something to do with the reduction of the deficit. Of course, that would have to derive from increased revenues from all sources.

I now understand the point. I do not think there is any point in following it up.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-74, An Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health.—(Honourable Senator Kenny).

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on the subject of Bill C-74, respecting the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, or CEPA, as it is more commonly known.

Bill C-74 replaces the Environmental Contaminants Act and broadens its scope. The bill also provides a means of identifying, scheduling and controlling toxic substances in order to safeguard the environment and human health.

In addition to amending the Environmental Contaminants Act, Bill C-74 consolidates the Clean Air Act, the Canada Water Act, Part III, the Ocean Dumping Control Act and the Department of the Environment Act, subsection 6(2). Inasmuch as all of the consolidation is "old news," the thrust and substantive consideration of this bill should be directed at new methods of scheduling and controlling toxic substances.

On balance, it would be fair to say that Bill C-74 is a useful, small step forward in dealing with toxic substances. The name of the bill, however, is misleading since it does not address questions like acid rain, old toxic landfills, the "blob" in the St. Clair River, or cleaning up the environment in a general sense.

What the bill does do is set in place a framework to regulate chemicals on the marketplace, but the approach it takes tends towards the lowest common denominator. Rather than having the federal government take a strong central role in environmental protection, the bill calls for negotiations that will result in patchwork protection by each of the provinces so long as they have equivalent regulations to the federal government, but, unfortunately, the bill does not define what "equivalent" is.

The bill is weak in dealing with federal polluters. It is unclear what form of consultation is required with the provinces. It limits the rights of citizens to apply for an injunction to prevent a violation under the act and it fails to set national standards for environmental protection.

Honourable senators, I would now like, briefly, to look at these points in order.

Dealing first with federal polluters, the provisions of clause 54(1) allow the minister to regulate federal works or undertakings if two conditions are met: one, providing that no other act of Parliament allows for the making of regulations expressly to protect the environment; and, two, providing that the minister has the concurrence of the minister responsible for the activity.

In regard to the first condition, the bill does not specify that regulations protecting the environment under another act must be in place, only that the potential for regulating in such a manner exists. This raises the possibility that pollution by a federal agency could continue unabated and the Minister of the Environment would be prevented from acting because someone else had the potential to regulate the activity under a different piece of legislation.

● (1600)

Regarding the second condition, ministerial concurrence in the bill as it is written gives the minister responsible for the polluting activity the legal right to prevent regulations that protect the environment from being adopted. This escape clause should be removed or softened to demonstrate that the Ministry of the Environment has the authority to regulate federal pollution and protect the environment, without relying on the good will of the polluter.

Let me read from the bill. Clause 54(1) states:

Where no other Act of Parliament expressly provides for the making of regulations that result in the protection of the environment and apply to federal works or undertakings or federal lands, the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister and with the concurrence of the Minister of the Crown who has the administration and control of or duties and functions in relation to those works, undertakings or lands, make regulations applicable thereto for the protection of the environment.

This problem could be solved if the first three lines of clause 54(1) were to read, "Where no regulations are made under any other Act of Parliament expressly provide for the protection of the environment . . .", or words to that effect.

Regarding the concurrence requirement, either it should be deleted or it should be changed to say that the minister may seek the concurrence of the minister responsible, but it should not make concurrence a mandatory step in the regulatory process.

On the subject of federal-provincial consultation, another area of concern relates to subclause 34(1) of the bill. On November 24 of last year the minister, appearing before a committee in the other place, stated, "Under the new amendments, the federal government is not compelled to consult with the provinces before taking action." But subclause 34(1) reads:

Subject to subsection (3), where an order has been made to add a substance to the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I, the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Ministers after the federal-provincial advisory committee is provided an opportunity to render its advice under section 6, make regulations with respect to the substance, including regulations providing for or imposing requirements respecting—

And then it goes on.

My concern here is that this provision unnecessarily limits the minister by making the opportunity to render advice mandatory. While I am not opposed to consultation—in fact, in many cases it is desirable in order to avoid overlapping regulations, it would be far preferable to make this consultation discretionary. This would also be consistent with clause 6 of the bill.

I would now like to turn to the question of equivalency. In an attempt to sell the notion of equivalency, the Minister of the Environment told the Legislative Committee in the other place that several criteria would be used to measure equivalency.

In the Minutes and Proceedings of the committee, Issue No. 14, page 7, the minister said, and I quote:

Equivalency will be assessed against several criteria. Firstly, the provincial environmental quality standard or release limit must be at least equal to the federal standard. It must at least match it; if it exceeds it, all the better, whether prescribed in a licence or a control order or a regulation.

Secondly, for the above purpose, measurements and test procedures must be comparable for the federal government and the individual province concerned. Thirdly, the provincial standard must be enforced in a fair and predictable manner, consistent with the principles of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, its enforcement and compliance policy in particular. Fourthly, penalties under the equivalent provincial measure must be comparable to those specified in CEPA.

Unfortunately, none of these criteria found their way into the legislation. If equivalency provisions are to be a fact of life, the public should at least have the reassurance that the yardsticks used to measure equivalency are spelled out in the legislation, and not in flexible policy statements made by ministers.

In addition, a number of environmental groups have suggested that the equivalency agreements should be publicly reviewed prior to signing to ensure that the public interest and the environment will be protected through such an agreement.

I believe that the solution to these deficiencies is to incorporate the four criteria for the determination of equivalency—as spelled out by the minister to the committee—into the bill and also include some form of public review of equivalency agreements as they evolve, rather than after the fact.

Lack of legally entrenched criteria is not the only difficulty with the problem of equivalency. As my friend and colleague, Senator Robertson, pointed out in her eloquent remarks in this chamber on May 17, 1988, there will be one agreement per province per regulation.

Senator Robertson also indicated that a "blue ribbon panel" of experts has been assembled to identify a priority list of 50 substances out of the thousands in the marketplace.

Think about it for a minute. What the government is proposing is potentially as follows: a starting list of 50 priority substances multiplied by perhaps dozens of regulations per substance times ten provinces. If there were, say, 24 regulations per substance, this would work out to 12,000 interprovincial equivalency agreements. This will be a massive patchwork—or crazy quilt—of equivalency agreements requiring an army of federal-provincial negotiators.

No wonder some have referred to this as the “Meech Laking” of the environment.

Then there is the question of auditing and monitoring. Turning to Senator Robertson again, on page 3387 of the Senate Debates, she stated:

First, equivalency agreements are not fixed in stone. If an individual jurisdiction fails to adhere to the letter and the spirit of the agreement, the agreement will be cancelled with six months' notice. Federal inspectors will then be on the job to ensure full compliance with all regulations under the federal act.

In addition to negotiating these thousands of equivalency agreements, the federal government is going to audit them and monitor them and report on them once a year. It is going to do all of this with 50 person years and a budget of $5 million. That comes to five person years per province.

How will it work out, I wonder. Will two people negotiate the hundreds of equivalency agreements required for a particular province and will the remaining three monitor and audit their performance, or will four people negotiate the agreements and the fifth monitor and audit?

My point is that with Bill C-74 we are getting a morass of federal-provincial agreements that will take forever to negotiate and will be impossible to monitor or audit with the limited staff available.

While the federal government is going to devote 50 person years and $5 million towards enforcement and monitoring, the Ontario government alone is currently spending $34 million and has 619 person years devoted to the task. Realistically, we have to ask: How many new substances can the federal government hope to cope with in a year under this legislation? How many individual agreements per province and per regulation can we realistically expect to see? How is the federal government really going to audit the performance of the provinces? How, indeed, is the federal government going to audit its own performance?

Turning to the question of the rights of citizens, on May 17 Senator Robertson commented on the desirability of an environmental bill of rights. Quite correctly, she noted that this bill permits any citizen to file a request in writing with the minister to add a substance to the priority substances list and that any two Canadians can petition the minister to investigate alleged infractions. But she did not mention that under Bill C-74 the Minister of the Environment is the only person in Canada able to apply to a court for an injunction to prevent or stop a potential violation of the bill.

Clause 135 of the bill reads:

Where, on the application of the Minister, it appears to a court of competent jurisdiction that a person has done or is about to do or is likely to do any act or thing constituting or directed toward the commission of an offence under this Act, the court may issue an injunction ordering any person named in the application

- (a) to refrain from doing any act or thing that it appears to the court may constitute or be directed toward the commission of an offence under this Act; or
- (b) to do any act or thing that it appears to the court may prevent the commission of an offence under this Act.

On November 25, 1987, the minister, speaking for the legislative committee in the other place, said:

I think it is terribly important that some of the enforcement clout of a bill involve the citizen.

If this were the case, and if any citizen were allowed to seek an injunction, we would, in fact, have a significant element in an environmental bill of rights. I believe that clause 135 of the bill should be changed accordingly. If we really believe that every citizen should be concerned about the environment, it seems only appropriate that any citizen should have the ability to seek an injunction to prevent an infraction before it occurs.

In conclusion, I should like to quote once again from Senator Robertson's speech on page 3387 of the Debates of the Senate, where she says:

The Canadian environment is no longer pristine. Arctic haze hangs over the vast tundra regions and acid rain is killing our lakes and threatening our forests. Industrial pollution has spoiled our major rivers and is impairing water quality. Unenlightened agricultural practices are depleting and eroding valuable farmlands, and wildlife is in retreat as vital habitats are destroyed.

Unfortunately, the new elements of Bill C-74 do nothing to clean up any of these problems. Bill C-74 is a slow and cumbersome process of classifying and handling new toxic materials and it constitutes a very modest step in environmental regulation. I believe that the minister himself has come to realize this. Senators will recall that in December of 1986 he referred to CEPA as “the toughest pollution legislation in the western hemisphere.” Then, on April 9, 1987, he said:

Let us make the Environmental Protection Act as strong as we can now, while acknowledging our limitations and those imposed on us by a system that is far from ideal.

Finally, at a press conference in June of 1987 he referred to it modestly as “a first step toward cleaning up the environment.”

Honourable senators, there are many other questions that a committee of this chamber will want to examine in relation to Bill C-74. They are too numerous to go into here, but, in particular, I would like to draw to the attention of senators the concern of the Cree Band from northern Quebec as it relates to their category 1A lands. I wish to serve notice that I will be providing to the committee that deals with this legislation a copy of their brief.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that, if Senator Robertson speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I said almost everything I wanted to say about this bill a week to ten days ago. While it will be obvious to senators that I do not agree with all of the interpretations of my honourable colleague, Senator Kenny, we will have sufficient opportunity for the clarification of those misunderstandings, because I intend to move that the bill be referred to committee at the appropriate time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-first report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (A), 1988-89), presented on Tuesday, May 31, 1988.

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, a few words of explanation on the Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1988-89, which amount to $113.9 million. This is a special budget for one program only, namely the Special Canadian Grains Program. This program was established in 1986 and since then has continued to be applied by the Minister of Agriculture.

This budget arises from the fact that of the $800 million allocated last year for the 1987 crop, $113.9 million remained unused and the total assigned for that crop year was $1.1 billion. The National Finance Committee had already presented three reports on this program: the first on December 18, 1986; the second on March 12, 1987; the third on January 27, 1988. In each of these reports, the committee commented on some aspects of this program and its application in the 1986 and 1987 crop years.

Honourable senators who are agricultural experts can comment appropriately on this special program if they see fit when we discuss this program further at the time the bill to follow these supplementary estimates is presented, as is the usual procedure. Thank you for your attention.

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report adopted.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (drought conditions in western Canada), presented on Tuesday, May 31, 1988.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of Senator Barootes, in whose name this order stands, I should like to make a few comments on the report that was tabled last Thursday pursuant to the reference given to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on May 19.

We were very fortunate to have a timely appearance by the Minister of Agriculture before the committee on Thursday, May 26. As you all know from what has been said about this subject, it is considered to be an urgent matter. As such, it is important that it be commented on at the earliest possible date, and, indeed, such a request was made of me from the committee.

I do not intend to spend much time on the report itself, other than to say that, on an urgent basis, it asks the government to give assistance to livestock producers in the drought-affected areas of western Canada by developing a program to assist with transportation costs of forage, water, and livestock, if suitable pasture can be found at a convenient location.

The committee considered this at some length in the context of previous responses from governments to these kinds of difficulties and tied its recommendation to a previous program, introduced in 1980-81, called the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program. The committee said that the programs forthcoming should not be less generous than those previous programs. The committee was also at pains to urge that the government develop these programs only in consultation with provincial governments.

Finally, by way of explanation of the fourth recommendation, an alternative for livestock producers is that they sell their livestock in the face of no feed and no water. There is a hardship on livestock producers in the event they are forced to do this, because most of them would report their income on a cash basis. The total value of livestock inventory that was liquidated would be declared as income in the year of liquidation. Of course, if they sold their cows, sheep or goats, or whatever, because they could not feed them and could not restock their farms until a later date past the year end, they would be faced with a very large and unjust tax bill. A number of livestock associations and others have urged for some time, and the committee recommends, that the Income Tax Act be varied to accommodate this problem by allowing the farmer who has so acted—that is, liquidated his inventory—not to have to take that income into income for tax purposes until some later year, provided that it is within a reasonable time of the liquidation.

Tax matters are always complicated. It would be useful if farmers knew at the present time whether or not they could pursue this option, without having the risk of facing an unjust and unfair tax bill in the current year.

The problem of the drought has been well described in the media. Therefore, I do not need to spend much time on the drought in its human dimension. Let me simply say in that regard that there is now absolutely nothing more important to farmers in the drought-stricken area than the next rain. The next rain for most of them has not yet come. As I said, the minister was very prompt in responding to our request to appear. In fact, he indicated that, through the PFRA, for which he is responsible, the current situation is being closely monitored. In fact, there are funds available in the PFRA programs now. He told us that some $7 million is available for certain kinds of assistance to bring water to livestock, to create dugouts, to create water storage, in addition to programs that could be funded from a $7 million fund for soil conservation and related matters.

Yesterday the minister announced a $12 million increase in that $7 million fund in order that additional funding be made available, for a total of $19.2 million for the 1988-89 fiscal year. It is true that this program will be of assistance and will help producers deal with the crisis they now face.

As you will see from its report, the committee feels that much more should have been done. I believe the minister agrees with that. The minister, in his testimony before the committee, said:

I have been warning colleagues in the Cabinet about it—and he is speaking of the drought.

I thought we would be into stage two three weeks ago and stage three today.

Let me explain that statement. Under the PFRA system of monitoring and dealing with drought there are three phases that are considered to be important. The first phase is the shortage of domestic water, not only for livestock but for other users, including people. This stage has been under way for some time and, in fact, the program announced responds to the difficulty that occurs as a result of the phase one problem.

Phase two is the problem the Senate committee considers exists now; the committee considers it important that policies be brought forward to deal with the shortage of forage and the difficulty of knowing how one should respond to this problem in light of the current situation. I regret to say that the situation today has much more in common with what has been characterized as the "Dirty Thirties" than with the drought. The situation that we face today coincides with a difficult economic time for farmers that you will recall was discussed in this chamber by a number of senators in the context of a report on farm finance brought forward by the committee.

The minister thought that phase two would have commenced in terms of delivering assistance. I go to other evidence that he presented before the committee. He said that he would be meeting with the four provincial Ministers of Agriculture from the west. Indeed, he was asked by the Prime Minister to meet with them. He pointed out to us that he wanted to see representatives of the livestock industry at that meeting. I heard on this morning's news and I read in today's media that the representative of the livestock industry at that meeting was Mr. Stan Wilson, a past president of the Canadian Cattle-men's Association. Mr. Wilson indicated that it was his feeling that this matter of forage problems and so on should not be considered for two or three weeks, which would bring us to some time between June 13 and 20.

While for partisan reasons we might want to fault the minister on his concern and his willingness to act, I do not believe we have any cause to do so. At this point we are waiting for representatives of the livestock industry to say that there is indeed a crisis, which many of us on the Senate committee feel is now the case. Most of the members of the committee commute back and forth to that region and see that that area beneath the aircraft is as brown as it was in the middle of winter, when there was no snow. As well, the provincial Ministers of Agriculture must take some action.

We hope that the minister will take to heart our recommendations, together with his own concerns, and be prepared to act quickly. As I have said, the members of the committee felt that problems were upon us at this moment—they were not problems likely to materialize in two or three weeks, assuming there is no rain. The committee, in its deliberations, acted in a high-minded way and in a non-partisan way in considering this issue, which is of the utmost importance to western Canadian agriculture.

The committee will continue its deliberations pursuant to the reference given to it and pursuant either to this particular report now tabled or to a further interim report. I expect to have further advice for the Senate in due course.

• (1630)

Those are my comments at this time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the report that was just given to you and with the comments made by my friend and colleague, Senator Hays.

It is true that we had a most informative and helpful briefing from the minister and his colleagues and associates in the department and in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration. We did learn to our satisfaction that the PFRA and his people are on what I would call red alert; they are monitoring this closely. But the situation is not only serious; it is also deteriorating.

Furthermore, honourable senators, we know that the minister met yesterday—I believe in Calgary—with his counterparts in the four western provinces and some good was forthcoming from that. The announcement was, as Senator Hays has suggested, an additional $12 million, which virtually triples the amount of money available for the transportation of water. In addition to that, his presence did bring some water to Alberta, because some rain fell yesterday, though it was trivial and insufficient to get us out of this serious situation.

I was somewhat pleased—and I notice that my colleague was somewhat surprised—at the comment made by the past president of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association following this announcement. Concerning the $12 million for drought relief in the way of water supply, he said:

This is one of the areas where we need some help. That is, in water levels. He went on to say:
...dugouts and wells are very low, so whenever help is available, we accept it gratefully.

This is one of the times in this country that you notice that when something is done for western Canadians they express their gratitude. But he went on to say—and this was rather unusual:

... the Prairie region's livestock sector is already adjusting to this year's harsh conditions. They're not really dependent on government programs.

I do not know whether I can credit or qualify that statement, but I know this: The agriculture ministers of Alberta and Saskatchewan feel somewhat more strongly than that. They feel that this is timely help, but that it will not suffice. I am sure that, even with rains coming in the next few days, which we pray and hope for, this may not be sufficient. I look forward, as has said the premier of my province, to weekly and even daily announcements of further programs to assist in alleviating this condition. I look forward to hearing of more programs that could save the basic herds and the brood cows before they are sent to market, before they are slaughtered and before they cause a rapid drop in the price of beef on the Canadian market, which could be devastating. In the meantime, we realize, and others will document, that the cost of forage and feed is rising as farmers and ranchers scramble to get this feed.

Realizing that these things happen; that the mechanics and the bureaucracy of government move slowly; that something done today is unlikely to be seen in its realization at the end point for some time; that the machinery is slow and must be slow to ensure that everything is done properly and within the proper administration; and given the tardiness of instituting a program, the members of this committee felt that those recommendations should be given to the Minister of Agriculture now, today. Why? So that he and his officials can be stimulated to have the programs to be instituted—perhaps even the finance, if necessary—right at hand so that, when he says, "Go", they start from the starting blocks, and not as if they were starting into training as to which administrative instruments and ways they should utilize to execute these necessary measures.

It is in the hope of putting a program in place expeditiously and quickly, if it is necessary in the next few days and weeks—and I believe in my heart that it will be necessary to do something more in the future—that we have associated ourselves together, not as partisan, political people but as friends of agriculture and the agricultural industry in this country.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to participate in this debate briefly today. In a few minutes I will adjourn the debate until tomorrow so I can have an opportunity to check with certain people in western Canada who I think are knowledgeable about this situation.

I am disappointed that the ministers' meeting in Calgary yesterday could not come up with a more comprehensive program than simply to say that "We will do a little more"—in fact, quite a lot more; I admit that—"for water development." As has been pointed out, the new $19.2 million budget was originally funded at $7.2 million. There are thousands of people out there already who are in great difficulty.

While I was listening to Senator Barootes I could not help but agree with the way that he put it. He was not being all that critical of his own party and his own government, although you could read into it that he believed they should have acted before now. If there had been another great Conservative here today, John George Diefenbaker, he would have pointed his finger at the government and said, "Justice delayed is justice denied."

We have been waiting for days, weeks, for this government to act! So they had a great meeting yesterday. After all the fanfare of going through several days of telling us that the Prime Minister had ordered his Minister of Agriculture to call a meeting of all the ministers in western Canada, and so on—after all that is finished, they come along and say, "We will help you develop some water supplies and that sort of thing." He then said something that surprised me. He said, "It has not reached crisis proportions yet."

I heard the Minister of Agriculture in the committee. I believe sincerely, as Senator Hays and Senator Barootes have already pointed out, that he wants to move. He can see that there is already a problem, so I am not too critical of him.

However, in my opinion, and as Senator Barootes pointed out, he is listening to the wrong people out in the west. When the minister says that there is not a crisis now, but that there might be two or three weeks from now, I think that indicates that he is listening to the wrong people. I personally checked with some of the hay dealers out west and they are not taking any more orders. They have sold to their regular customers all the hay that they had.

In any event, I do not intend to explore this subject any further today, because I need a little more time to check around. However, I intend to come back tomorrow with some of the facts from the people who are living right in the affected areas. Therefore, I wish to adjourn the debate until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

MOTION TO INSTRUCT NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO DIVIDE BILL C-103 INTO TWO BILLS—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 31, 1988, moved:

That it be an instruction of this House to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that it divide Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, into two Bills, in order that it may deal separately with Part I, entitled the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and Part II, entitled Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It may be that I do not understand exactly what Senator Graham has in mind. However, when his motion says that he would like the committee to be instructed to divide the proposed legislation into two bills, I would ask whether it is for the purpose of the study by the committee, in order to have the committee report separately on Part I and Part II of the bill, or does he have in mind the technical division of one bill into two bills? What is the exact operation the honourable senator has in mind? Perhaps he could describe the process to us.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, if I were allowed to speak on my motion, I would explain what I have in mind.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to allow the honourable senator to explain that point. However, I must say that if what he wants done is a technical division of the bill by the committee, then I will reserve my right to rise on a point of order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that, if the motion is put and the debate commences, which will happen if Senator Graham speaks, it will then be too late to raise the point of order. I believe that if the motion is in order then it must be put. If there is a point of order raised against the regularity of the motion, then we ought to debate that and settle it now.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen is again playing a game, which I have seen him do before. Now he says it is too late to raise a point of order, that the question must be put before anyone rises on a point of order. In fact, the honourable senator was just rising to speak. In fact, he would not have been willing to speak at all had the motion been carried. Therefore, I raised the point of order. It depends on the meaning Senator Graham puts on this motion, and I cannot see why I am too late to be doing that. I do not know when otherwise I could have done it.

Senator MacEachen: I believe that Senator Flynn has misunderstood my comment. I agree totally that Senator Flynn has the right to raise a point of order as to the regularity of the motion and that we could have a discussion on that matter.

However, I think I am on solid ground in saying that if the motion is put and debate is commenced on the motion, then it is inappropriate to raise a point of order at that stage, because the motion is in the possession of the house; it has been moved and the debate has commenced.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean it is too late?

Senator Doody: No, not yet.

Senator MacEachen: No. If the honourable senator wishes to raise a point of order on the regularity of the motion, I think it ought to be dealt with now. In fact, I would say that the honourable senator has the full right to deal with a point of order at this point.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, as I read the motion, it indicates to me that Senator Graham wants the committee to prepare two bills instead of the one that has been referred to the committee. However, if Senator Graham tells me that that is not what he has in mind, and he is willing to amend his motion to say that what he wants the committee to do is study the bill as it was referred to it and report separately on the two parts—in other words, report separately on each part of the bill—then, of course, the committee can do that, even without any instruction from the Senate.

However, if what Senator Graham has in mind is a splitting process, and he is saying to us: "I want you to make two bills out of the bill that has been referred to the committee," then I think that is a procedure that is totally irregular. In any event, it seems to me that it is too late, because the bill as a whole has been referred to committee. To ask the committee to do what this motion suggests is inappropriate, because the Senate has already adopted the bill at second reading stage. This motion should have been put before the motion for second reading was put.

If it is the purpose of Senator Graham to have the bill split in two, I can tell him that this procedure has never been followed, to my recollection. Such a procedure has been followed in the House of Commons, where the Speaker has been asked to rule that it is irregular for the government to include in two bills two matters that should be considered separately. In that situation the request to split is usually made right at the beginning, not after the bill has received second reading. I believe it says in Beauchesne's that this procedure is not acceptable, because it is something that must be decided by the Senate, not by a committee.

I have here a precedent found in Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Twentieth Edition, at page 502. It is found in a note at the bottom of the page. It refers to an incident that occurred a long time ago. However, as I have said, we have not been able to find any precedent or any recent occasion that would resemble what this motion is instructing the committee to do. The note refers to an incident in 1852, and we do not know whether there has been any similar incident since then. It reads:

Only one attempt has been made to divide a bill brought from the Commons... and this was defeated. But the instruction was objected to on its merits as well as on its unprecedented nature and the technical difficulties it would create, so that the propriety of dividing a Commons bill has not been decided. The Government of India Act

1935 was divided, between the date of Royal Assent and the date of coming into operation, by a separate Act—

That is the only precedent and the act involved was divided by the government.

I do not see what the honourable senator wants. Would he have the committee give a separate number to each bill? Would he have an introduction in each bill, as well as provisions for Royal Assent and proclamation? He is asking the committee to do something that is very technical, and not within the competence of the committee.

In any event, it seems to me that, if Senator Graham has in mind something that would require the Senate or the committee to make a decision on each part of the bill, that could be done in committee, without any instruction. The committee can decide whether it wants Part I to come into force, or whether it wants to strike out Part I or Part II, or whether it wants to amend Part I and Part II, or whether it wants to recommend that Part I be adopted and that Part II not be adopted. This can be done by the committee. It seems to me that the only problem Senator Graham faces is the suggestion of this very technical process of splitting the bill, which, I think, comes too late and is unprecedented.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Flynn has identified the purpose of the motion put forward by Senator Graham; namely, to divide the bill into two bills. That is what is intended. Senator Flynn has suggested that it would be within the power of the committee to defeat, for example, Part I of the bill. In a sense, that suggestion gives me the encouragement to add that if the committee has the power to extinguish and defeat totally Part I of the bill, then it is not asking a great deal to have the committee deal with the two parts of the bill separately by having them split into two separate bills, which would proceed from the committee independently, one from the other. In that process the committee could easily sever the Atlantic Opportunities Agency and put it in one bill and put the Enterprise Cape Breton provisions in another bill. Whatever consequential amendments in Part III are required in the two bills can be related to the appropriate bills I have described. One of the criteria put forward by the authorities, particularly Erskine May, is that the bill be such that it can easily be severable. I have never seen a bill that is more capable of being severed into two parts than this one.

I want to follow up on the procedural argument made by Senator Flynn, but before I do so I would make the following point: that the purpose of this motion is to provide an opportunity within the committee to deal with two separate subjects, each on its own merits. It may be possible for both the committee and the Senate to deal more quickly, for example, with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency bill than with the Enterprise Cape Breton bill, which has, to some of us, profound difficulties. It ought not to be viewed on its face as an obstructive measure. It can be regarded as a facilitative measure, but that is really not on the procedural point and could be debated under the motion itself.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn has said that there is no precedent in the Canadian Senate for dividing bills, and I accept that point readily. I have not been able to find a precedent where the Canadian Senate has given an instruction to a committee to divide a bill. He has pointed out a case in the British House of Lords which I have examined. In that case a motion was made by the Marquis of Salisbury, a prominent Conservative no doubt, to divide a bill. Whoever acted as Speaker in that chamber put the motion. There were no procedural objections. The motion was debated extensively and the lords decided not to authorize or instruct the committee to divide the bill. There is no question that the motion itself was in order, because it was put and debated and divided upon. Therefore, the motion was in order. This motion, if it is found to be in order, can be accepted, or defeated, as was the case in the House of Lords.

• (1700)

I say to Senator Flynn that it is without precedent in the Canadian Senate. Some things are happening presently in the House of Commons that are without precedent. The Leader of the Government, himself, in the House of Commons said that the motion on abortion was breaking new ground; but I would put that to one side. If we look at our own standing rules of the Senate, the first rule states:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Therefore, the practices and usages of the House of Commons are quite relevant, applicable and constitute precedents for the Senate of Canada.

Before going into precedents from the House of Commons, may I just refer to a number of authorities who unanimously hold that after second reading an instruction may be given to a committee allowing it to divide a bill. For example, Beauchene's Fifth Edition, at page 230, states:

An Instruction is required to enable a committee to divide a bill into two or more bills . . .

Further, Bourinot, Fourth Edition, at page 525, states:

A committee may, in conformity with instructions, consolidate two bills into one or divide one bill into two or more . . .

Senator Flynn: In the House of Commons.

Senator MacEachen: Senator Flynn interjects and says, "In the House of Commons." Precisely: "In the House of Commons." Rule 1 of the Senate tells us that the practices, usages and precedents of the House of Commons can guide the Senate. Rule 1 of the Senate states that, where there is no provision in our rules or practices, the rules and practices of the House of Commons are precedents that constitute guidance to us.

Senator Roblin: Since when?

Senator MacEachen: That has always been the case in the Senate. Senator Roblin said, "Since when?" I cannot answer that, but I presume that has been the situation since the rules of the Senate were adopted.

Senator Roblin: Honoured in the breach, not in the observance.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I refer to a further useful reference from the authorities, and that is Erskine May's, Nineteenth Edition, where, at page 473, it states:

After second reading, an Instruction to the committee on a bill may be moved . . .

Instructions are of two kinds, permissive and mandatory.

Permissive Instructions.—The object of a permissive instruction is to confer on the committee authority to do something which, without the instruction, they would have no power to do, for example, to divide a bill into two bills . . .

I do not intend to go into the limitations which have been cited by Beauchene and Erskine May as to when it is technically possible to divide a bill. I do not think they are relevant, because, if ever a bill were separable into parts, it is this particular bill. However, anyone who wishes to follow that up can do so by looking at these authorities.

Honourable senators, I refer briefly to Canadian precedents. In 1956 in the famous northern pipeline debate a motion was moved empowering the Committee of the Whole to divide a bill, and, obviously, a point of order was raised.

Senator Flynn: I did not say—and I do not think it serves any purpose to say—that it was done in the House of Commons. It is a question of the decision of the Speaker of the other place or of the initiative of the government. I do not deny that this has been done in the House of Commons. I am asking for a precedent in the Senate or at this stage.

Senator MacEachen: I have already acknowledged, honourable senators, that there is no case that I can find in the Canadian Senate where a bill has been divided. I acknowledge that, but then I go on to read to the honourable senators rule 1, which states:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

It states quite clearly that what happens in the House of Commons can be followed in the Senate. It says, "... be followed in the Senate." Rule 1 states that precedents from the House of Commons are totally applicable, totally relevant and of total guidance in this situation.

If I may continue my exposition of the pipeline debate, a motion was moved empowering the Committee of the Whole to divide the bill. Speaker Beaudoin stated:

There is no question that this motion is in order because it is an instruction to the Committee of the Whole that the bill be divided in two.

Senator Flynn: That was before second reading.

Senator MacEachen: We have an earlier example in 1948 when, after the Canadian Wheat Board Act was given second reading, it was moved that there be "an instruction to the Committee of the Whole that they have power to divide Bill 135 into two bills"—and this should please our western colleagues—"in order that one might deal separately with oats and barley."

Senator Flynn: I never heard of it.

Senator MacEachen: The motion was put. The motion was moved, in fact, by the Right Honourable C. D. Howe. Surprisingly, it was defeated by his own party. It was put by the Speaker and defeated. The only minister that I could find who supported him was that incorruptible Nova Scotian, the Right Honourable J. L. Ilsley. It is clear that we have had instances in the House of Commons where motions have been put to divide a bill and that they are in order. Those precedents are applicable in this body, according to rule 1 of the Senate.

Senator Flynn has said that, even if it is appropriate, it is too late. I disagree with that quite completely, because in our own Senate we have given instructions to committees after they have been well into their work. The cases I have in mind are instances where motions were made with respect to the transportation bills and the drug bill. In these cases an instruction was moved and carried in this house, asking the committees to report by certain dates on bills which they were dealing with and which had been committed to them much earlier. But, in any event, the case is not in doubt at all on that point, because Erskine May's makes it quite clear in the case of bills, and I quote from the edition to which I have referred, at page 517:

In the case of bills referred to standing or select committees, an instruction can be moved as soon as the bill has been committed, (c), or subsequently (d).

Senator Graham gave notice of his motion to give an instruction immediately on the day that the bill was given second reading and committed. Under our rules there is a one-day notice required to give an instruction to a committee. So the logic of the case is clear; a senator puts his notice of motion, it comes up for debate and it is dealt with after the bill has been committed to the committee. That is in accordance with logic and our rules. It is in accordance with the citation from Erskine May's and is in accordance with the practice adopted by this Senate just a year ago in giving an instruction to two committees long after the Senate had given second reading to the bills.

I think the case is clear cut. We would not have taken this action, honourable senators, unless we had been on totally solid ground.

It is interesting that Senator Flynn himself cited a case emanating in the British House of Lords which is totally in accordance with the motion that has been put forward today by Senator Graham. I am surprised that there is this procedural fuss, because, if this motion were held to be irregular, such a ruling would dismiss the precedents of the Canadian House of Commons, the British House of Lords, rule 1 of the Senate and the precedents in our own Senate with respect to the instruction given to committees after bills had been committed.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Just a few words on this point. The Senate is, of course, master of its own proceedings. Moreover, there is no established prohibition that can be cited against Senator Graham's motion. That being the situation, we have to ask what reason there would be for a prohibition, if there were one.

I will not say anything about what can be done in the House of Commons; Senator MacEachen has established that a bill can be divided there, and I think Senator Flynn does not dispute that at all.

I suppose the basic argument against dividing a bill in the second chamber, the upper house, would be that it would disturb a decision of the House of Commons; however, every time the House of Lords or the Senate amends a Commons bill it disturbs or alters the bill that was passed by the House of Commons. So that argument does not help those who oppose Senator Graham's motion.

The fact that there is no constitutional principle that would be offended by a decision to divide a bill that already has passed the House of Commons is borne out eloquently by the precedents from the British House of Lords. Precedents are cited in Erskine May's, and the fact that they go back a long way shows that this is no frivolous, modern innovation. There is the precedent of the Bank of Ireland Bill in 1808; there is the precedent of the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill in 1836; and there is the precedent of the Ministry of Transport Bill in 1919.

Some Hon. Senators: Come on!

Senator Stewart: It is wonderful how honourable senators adjust their viewpoint. When something old favours them, its age proves that it is fundamental, it supports an age-old principle; but when something old does not favour them, they guffaw. The truth of the matter, as Senator MacEachen has said, is that it is quite unusual for a second chamber to divide a bill. There is no contest on that point, but there are notable examples of motions to divide bills having been accepted as in order by the British House of Lords. This demonstrates that it is not against constitutional principles to divide a bill.

It is important to put the words that appear in Erskine May's on our record, because, although Senator Flynn attempted to do so, I think because he was doing it from memory it did not come out quite correctly.

Let us take what Erskine May says with regard to the 1919 or Salisbury precedent. Erskine May states:

An instruction was moved on 29 July 1919 to the committee on the Ministry of Transport Bill, which originated in the House of Commons, to enable them to divide the bill into two bills (e). This proposal was objected to on its merits and it was also stated that no precedent could be found for so dividing a bill which had been received from the Commons.

[Senator MacEachen.]

I interject that that is the argument that was made. It was not challenged on the ground that it was out of order. They said that they could not find the precedents, although Erskine May's shows that there were precedents. I go on quoting:

Although the defeat of the Instruction on a division cannot in itself be said to preclude the possibility of a bill being divided in the Second House (since the motion was not ruled out of order), it is clear that considerable technical difficulties would arise if the course were adopted.

In other words, Erskine May's is saying that there is no question but that the motion to divide the bill was in order. That was not challenged at all. Good arguments, however, were made that there would be practical difficulties if the bill were to be divided, and it was on that ground, the latter ground, not the ground of procedure, that the motion was defeated.

If the motion had not been in order, it would not have been defeated, because it would never have been put to a vote of the house.

The question of procedure is clear. However we want to decide on the merits of Senator Graham's motion. That motion clearly is in order.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have only one or two words. Senator MacEachen quoted a lot of precedents—none after second reading.

Senator MacEachen: They were all after second reading.

Senator Flynn: No, they were before second reading.

Senator MacEachen: No, you are totally wrong. A bill does not go to committee until after second reading takes place.

Senator Flynn: I do not recall having seen any precedent for that. You quoted cases in the other place, but none dealt with the situation after second reading.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, of course—a bill is not sent to committee unless it gets second reading.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I know, but we give instructions to the committee before second reading.

Senator MacEachen: No, no, no!

Senator Flynn: Well, anyway, the point is that the Senate has given approval to the bill, as such. If it had been split, we would have had two questions to decide instead of one. We would have made a decision on one and perhaps another decision on the other; that is obvious. We have already decided on both parts of the same bill. But, by giving instructions to the committee to split the bill without the Senate's having given second reading separately to each of these bills, they would be before the committee without approval on second reading. To me, this is a question of procedure. This has to be done in the house and the decision cannot be made by a committee. As Senator Stewart has mentioned, May's Parliamentary Practice suggests that it is technically difficult for a committee to draft two bills from one.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think Senator Flynn misunderstands what Erskine May is saying. Let me read what is said with regard to mandatory instructions. May's holds that an instruction must be given after second reading:

This form of instruction may be moved at the conclusion of the second reading, to which assent may have been given with the knowledge that such an instruction would be moved.

Therefore, an instruction to a committee is moved after the second reading has been voted on by the house, and that is the time at which it should be moved, on the basis of common sense.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, while Beauchesne's is not always crystal clear, in this case it is very direct. I refer to the Fifth Edition, page 230, where, under "Proceedings on Public Bills", "Admissible Instructions", citation 761.(2) states:

Division of bill—An Instruction is required to enable a committee to divide a bill into two or more bills, but such an Instruction is in order only if the bill is drafted into two or more distinct parts or else comprising more than one subject matter . . .

Honourable senators, this bill is clearly divided into two parts.

Turning to the previous page, citation 759.(1) states:

The time for moving an Instruction is immediately after the committal of the bill . . .

In other words, after the bill has been committed—

Senator Flynn: It is too late now. The bill has been referred to the committee.

Senator Molgat: That is what has to be done. The "committal of the bill" means second reading. This citation states:

The time for moving an Instruction is immediately after the committal of the bill, or, subsequently, as an independant motion. The Instruction should not be given while the bill is still in the possession of the House, but rather after it has come into the possession of the committee.

Could there be anything clearer in English than that instruction?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has asked the Chair to rule on the acceptability of this motion. I will consider the point raised by Senator Flynn and that raised by Senator MacEachen and will rule later.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, are we to take it that we will get the ruling tomorrow, or will we return this evening for it?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The ruling will not be given tonight; it will be given tomorrow.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 2, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-113, an Act to promote the development and diversification of the economy of Western Canada, to establish the Department of Western Economic Diversification and to make consequential amendments to other Acts, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, May 17, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, in the absence of the chairman and the deputy chairman, I have the honour to present the fifty-third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 3580.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

AIR CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-129

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 7, 1988, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-129, An Act to provide for the continuance of Air Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares thereof to the public, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the adjournment motion here, which is for the usual time on Tuesday next. I am in a quandary. I would like to know what His Honour the Speaker intends to do with regard to the decision on yesterday's procedural discussion. It might be that the Senate will want to sit tonight or tomorrow or Monday. I am not suggesting at this point that it should. I am simply saying that I would rather reserve this and sense the mood of the Senate with regard to its intention for the next little while. Therefore, with the agreement of the Senate, I would ask leave to revert to Notices of Motions later today.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must say that I do not understand the difficulty which the deputy leader has inferred. I just want to be enlightened; that is all.

Senator Doody: I can quite understand that. I have been told that the decision of the Chair respecting the procedural discussion we had yesterday with regard to Senator Graham's motion may be deferred until a later date; in other words, it may not be given today. In light of the fact that it was suggested yesterday that we might return last night to hear the decision, if it was ready, it seemed to me that it might be just as appropriate to return tomorrow or Monday or whenever. I am not suggesting that we do that. I am simply saying that we should leave open the option to do so, if the Senate desires to return or His Honour has his decision ready.

Hon. Charles McElman: You said that with a straight face, too. What did it mean?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I was absent yesterday. When I arrived this morning, I was asked to chair the sitting this afternoon. I looked into the proceedings of yesterday. A very serious point of order was raised during the session yesterday. I have not had time to look into the citations given by Senator MacEachen, Senator Flynn and Senator Stewart about the acceptability of the motion of Senator Graham. I ask your indulgence. I will not be able to give my decision this afternoon. Over this coming weekend I want to study the precedents cited yesterday, and I will be in a position to give you my decision at the sitting next Tuesday afternoon.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not know whether it is appropriate to make any comments at this stage, but I must make a comment based upon what occurred in the Senate yesterday, namely, that the Honourable the Acting Speaker stated as follows:

Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has asked the Chair to rule on the acceptability of this motion.

That is in accordance with the facts. He went on to say:

I will consider the point raised by Senator Flynn and that raised by Senator MacEachen and will rule later.

So it was my expectation that the Acting Speaker, who was in the Chair with full authority, and who had heard the argument, would make the ruling. I then asked as follows:

Honourable senators, are we to take it that we will get the ruling tomorrow, or will we return this evening for it?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker replied:

The ruling will not be given tonight; it will be given tomorrow.

That is what I understood to be the case. In view of the Honourable the Acting Speaker's reply, Senator Graham consulted me yesterday on what he ought to do, because he had a full program of engagements in Nova Scotia today. On the ground that the Honourable the Acting Speaker had assured us of a ruling today, I urged him to change his plans and remain in Ottawa so that he could hear the ruling and deal with his motion.

I was notified a few moments before 2 o'clock today that there was not to be a ruling and that the Honourable the Acting Speaker would not be in the chamber. Now we have been advised by the Honourable the Speaker pro tempore that he will give a ruling on Tuesday next.

I accept that, but I must say that I feel like apologizing to Senator Graham for having accepted the assurance of the Honourable the Acting Speaker that he would give a ruling on this matter today.

I would expect that, since neither the Speaker nor the Speaker pro tempore was in the chamber yesterday, we can have a ruling from the Speaker himself on Tuesday.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I suppose that if Senator MacEachen had accepted my view yesterday Senator Graham could have explained his motion, reserving the right to raise the point of order later.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, if it is the wish of the chamber—and obviously it is—that we come back on Tuesday, I will put the adjournment motion.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 7, 1988 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA— GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL COMMITMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the financing of another oil sands processing plant in Alberta. I did ask the leader a question on this matter on March 16, 1988. At that time he advised me that there were some discussions under way between the federal government, the provincial government and a consortium of private companies known as OSLO, which is considering this plant.

An announcement was made yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Marcel Masse, to the effect that he expects that within the next two weeks the government may be able to make a firm announcement, that at the present time apparently the Government of Alberta and the Government of Canada have agreed on a financing package and that both governments are willing to support that package.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the federal government's commitment is regarding the financing of this operation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I must speak on this matter subject to correction. I have not seen the statements that have been attributed to my colleague, the Honourable Marcel Masse. My latest information on the matter is that a proposal had been made by the OSLO group, that it is still being considered by the federal government and the Government of Alberta, and that we had undertaken to respond formally to the OSLO group in the near future.

● (1410)

Again I speak subject to correction, but I am not aware that we have reached agreement on a financial package with the Province of Alberta. My latest information is that Alberta had made a proposal to the federal government earlier this week. I shall have to verify the suggestion of my honourable friend that agreement on a financial package has been reached between the two governments, because my latest information does not indicate that that is the case.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the reason I am asking for clarification is that yesterday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources apparently said a number of things, as reported in the Globe and Mail, about having reached an agreement on financing with Alberta. He said:

The financing accord would then be presented to the six OSLO partners for negotiation . . .

That leaves the implication that the two levels of government have worked out a financing arrangement that is to be presented to the OSLO partners. If that is not the way it is being handled, I would like to know. I understood from the minister's comments earlier that the proposal was from the OSLO partners to the governments, and not the other way around.

Senator Murray: The OSLO sponsors put forward a proposal some time ago. That proposal has been the subject of discussion between ourselves and the Province of Alberta at both the official level and the ministerial level. Two ministerial meetings have been held in the last few days, one last week, I believe, and the other earlier this week.

We have not yet formally responded to the OSLO sponsors. We hope to do so in the next little while. My latest information certainly does not indicate that any firm agreement on financing has been reached between the federal government and the Alberta government. My latest information is that the Alberta government had made a proposal to us which we were studying.

Again, I have not been speaking to the minister in the last couple of hours. I can only vouch for the latest information I have, which is perhaps a day or more old. I shall endeavour to get an update. Again, I repeat, my latest information does not indicate that we have an agreement on a financial package with the Government of Alberta.

Senator Olson: That is helpful. I believe the Leader of the Government has already made a commitment to look into the matter further; so I will raise this subject again on Tuesday next.

[Senator Olson.]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

COMPLIANCE WITH ACT

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, you will recall that this chamber expressed its distress when the Employment Equity Act was passed by the government a couple of years ago. Yesterday was the first date by which employers had to comply with what we would have preferred to call a "Statistical Reporting Act." Over the last little while mounds and mounds of data have been collected by employers at very considerable expense.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate how many employers delivered their reports by June 1, and what proportion of those who must comply with the Employment Equity Act or the Federal Contractors' Program have so complied.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I shall have to obtain the information from my colleague.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS ON MODIFICATIONS OF TERMS

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate in connection with Meech Lake, particularly with reference to the "seamless web" concept. Are there any discussions taking place now between officials under his direction and Quebec officials under the direction of Mr. Rémillard regarding possible modifications to the terms of the Meech Lake Accord?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The answer to that question is no, honourable senators.

Senator Lang: As a supplementary, are any such discussions under way with respect to any officials of other provincial jurisdictions?

Senator Murray: The answer to that question is also no.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PRESIDENCY—APPOINTMENT TO FILL VACANCY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the presidency of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which the Honourable Senator Murray should know has been vacant for over six months?

Is the government any closer to making a choice to fill that vacancy?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Graham: I thank the Honourable Senator Murray for his usual succinct response, but could he provide more illumination? The rumour mill has been active for several weeks—indeed, for several months.

I might observe in posing my question that Dr. Teresa MacNeil, chairman of Devco, has done yeoman service and provided the community with great leadership in her position as acting president, but has also indicated that that appointment as acting president is up within a matter of days. I understand as well that Dr. MacNeil has indicated that she would not want a continuance or renewal of whatever mandate she was given, which I understand was six months.

Could Senator Murray, against that background, give us a better time frame in which the appointment might be made?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me associate myself and the government fully with the honourable senator's comments about Dr. MacNeil. She has been acting president of Devco for some months now. All along she has been chairman of the board of Devco, is vice-chairman of Enterprise Cape Breton and a member of that board and also was recently confirmed as director of the extension department at St. Francis Xavier University. So she is a busy person. The government is grateful to her for the service that she has rendered to the corporation and the community in this and so many other respects.

All I can tell the honourable senator with regard to the presidency of Devco is that a decision on this matter is imminent.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-117, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.—(Honourable Senator Buckwold).

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to respond on behalf of this side to the proposal to have this chamber adopt Bill C-117, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

I look across the chamber at Senator Flynn, who proposed this bill in his usual able manner. It is customary to pay tribute to the proposer. I must say that I was rather amused at Senator Flynn as he read the words prepared for him by some propaganda writer in the minister's office.

Senator MacEachen: That was in Senator Atkins' office!

Senator Buckwold: Those words praised the success of the present government in financial management of the country;

bragged about better Treasury management, pointing out how taxpayers have benefited during the present political regime.

An Hon. Senator: False!

Senator Stanbury: Twenty-two billion dollars!

Senator Buckwold: I can well imagine how he would have reacted—and I refer to Senator Flynn—if I had delivered the same speech from this side. His head would have been shaking negatively, and in his good-natured way he would have interjected time and again with a phrase like, "You must be joking!"

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you?

Senator Stanbury: He was joking!

Senator Buckwold: I took him seriously for a while!

Senator Flynn: You did not take me seriously before.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, Bill C-117 is a bill which finally brings into law excise tax and sales tax increases that were announced in February 1987, June 1987, December 1987 and February 1988. All of them are already being charged to defenceless taxpayers and our task now is to make them legal. I deplore the long period of time this legislation has taken to be presented. What we have seen is unprecedented taxation by fiat, and not by legislation, brought into law. It is, I might suggest, another form of taxation without representation, a condition fought against for centuries.

I can understand the necessity for short-term delays because of the very nature of the financial implications of tax measures, but surely a serious government would have legitimized these issues long before this, rather than delaying the matter for a period of almost 15 months on important tax measures.

Honourable senators, I believe that this has created an unsatisfactory climate for taxation and, indeed, has created a dangerous precedent. However, honourable senators, we finally have before us Bill C-117, a bill that contains 77 pages. The Ten Commandments, expressing a model moral code for mankind, were written using 297 words. Bill C-117, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, has been expressed in 25,000 words.

What does this bill do? It legally codifies a series of taxes already imposed—taxes which will raise billions of dollars—and justifies it by asking the poor Canadian taxpayer to believe that the heavy tax increases are part of a global tax reform program in which the result is fiscally neutral. Honourable senators, I am not sure about "neutral," but in any event that is the phrase I believe the minister used.

They say that personal income taxes will be cut by $12 billion over the next five years. That cut will be made possible by this additional, retroactive, retrogressive, indirect taxation, plus some increase in corporate taxation. Honourable senators, if you believe that, let me tell you that I have a couple of bridges out in Saskatchewan I can give you a very good buy on.

Honourable senators, what we have here is really a government that has raised an additional $22 billion in taxation since taking office in 1984—

Senator Perrault: Robbery!

Senator Buckwold: —a government that now pats itself on the back for having reduced the deficit by a relatively minimal amount. We have a government elected on a platform of lower taxes and controlled expenditures, trying to get Canadians to believe that those objectives have been achieved.

Honourable senators, what we are looking at is a magic show featuring that world-famous illusionist, Wilson the Wonderful, who is performing some virtuoso feats and trying to create the impression that Canadian affairs are being properly managed and responsibly undertaken. This government, honourable senators, was elected on a platform of no increase in taxes, and yet we now have Bill C-117 before us. Let me explain how this is done in Bill C-117.

Senator Perrault: It is done by astrology!

Senator Buckwold: Here are some of the examples. First of all, we have a snackfood tax on ice cream, candy, potato chips, et cetera. Kids just love that tax!

Senator Perrault: Taking candy away from kids!

Senator Buckwold: Penny by penny, the government will bring in $70 million this year.

Senator Perrault: It is a candy tax!

Senator Buckwold: Next, there is a 4 per cent tax on tobacco. Those hooked on this habit will puff up another $50 million in 1988 and 1989. There is also an increase in sales tax on liquor and tobacco from 15 per cent to 18 per cent.

For those of you who fly, we have a transportation tax increase of $4, which we are already paying. Therefore, as we take to the air we will put an additional $50 million into the government coffers.

Then we have an increase in the telecommunications tax to 10 per cent. That tax is levied on long distance calls, telexes and cable TV.

Senator Perrault: Tax, tax, tax!

Senator Buckwold: To the government and to our illusionist, Mr. Wilson, who is always increasing taxes, that will be worth another $870 million this year.

Senator Perrault: Taxes for the memories!

Senator Olson: Taxes on the rural people!

Senator Buckwold: Most of these taxes will be paid by rural and small-town folk who, more than most people, use long distance as part of their way of life because of the very nature of the place in which they live.

Then we have a gasoline tax. We will be charged another one cent for a litre of gas. That tax just went on on April 1, and was applied after previous increases by Mr. Wilson of two cents per litre in September 1985, one cent per litre in January 1987 and one cent per litre in February 1987. Do honourable senators know that that one little extra penny will bring in $225 million for the balance of this year? Federal gasoline taxes have increased since 1984 by a total of 23 cents a gallon—

An Hon. Senator: Wow!

Senator Buckwold: —and this is the “no-tax-increase” government.

Senator Stanbury: That is more than the 18 cent levy!

Senator Buckwold: It is more than the 18 cents and it makes the National Energy Program, which was so severely criticized, look like a piker compared to what this government is doing to those who are using energy.

Senator Flynn: Here we are back in the 1980 election!

Senator Buckwold: There is not an actual increase in the overall federal sales tax in this legislation, because it would be increased beyond the level the Canadian public would stand for. Since 1984 the federal sales tax has gone up from 9 per cent to 12 per cent. That sounds fairly minimal—only 3 per cent. However, if you are in business you know what happens if you keep adding percentages on to percentages. I would be glad to illustrate to Senator Flynn, and others who are interested, how this 3 per cent federal sales tax increase really ends up costing consumers perhaps as much as 5 per cent by the time the particular product goes through the mark-ups of wholesalers, retailers and other costs of distribution.

Of course, this increase in taxes is one of the reasons the government is now worried a little bit about inflation. Therefore, it is keeping interest rates high to minimize that pressure. Part of that inflation is being brought on this country by the very actions of this “no-tax-increase” government, which is taking in billions of dollars. The 3 per cent sales tax increase will bring in an additional $3 billion. That tax shows up in many different ways.

Let us get back to the illusion—this business of the government saying that they are really doing well, that they are balancing budgets, that they are creating an improved deficit position, that they are satisfying the Canadian taxpayer. A little while ago the government, again in order to create the impression that it was doing so well, speeded up the payments of withholding taxes. In other words, if you were a business and you held back tax deductions from employees, those deductions had to be sent in earlier. Do honourable senators know how much that little move helped the government in that year? It helped by $2.6 billion.

Senator Murray: Don't you wish that you had thought of it?

Senator Buckwold: This year—and I am leading up to Senator Flynn's point here—the government has created a $1.6 billion windfall by speeding up the payment of the sales tax. Instead of sending in the tax under the usual program, manufacturers who collect sales tax have been asked to speed up their payments and get the money in faster. This will result in a reduction of the deficit for this year of $1.6 billion. Of course, we know that this is a one-shot deal, and that next year they will have to find some other device. First the government raised $2.6 billion through withholding taxes; this year it is raising $1.6 billion by speeding up the sales tax payment process. Where they will get the money from next year, I am not quite sure. They may sell Air Canada, which would be a big windfall to the treasury, because, under the peculiar accounting procedures of the government's financial wizards, such payments are made to count as revenue and to make things look really good.

Well, they can keep selling off assets, but some day they will have to pay the piper.

All these taxes, honourable senators, have increased the cost of living. They have raised prices and they have made it more difficult for Canadian industry to be competitive.

If one looks at the record for 1984 to 1988, one will find that the government has increased overall taxes by $32.4 billion—a 46 per cent increase in that four-year period. Still to come in the smoke-and-mirror show is phase two, namely, the sales tax program. We are not quite sure whether it will be a sales tax applied in conjunction with provincial governments or whether it will be a value-added tax, but I gather that everything from an escort agency to a funeral home will be paying a tax to the government.

It is all part of the illusion!

Phase two should be brought in now. We should know where we stand on this whole business of increased indirect taxation, which is an insidious way of collecting money from the people of Canada. However, on the very good advice of our political leaders of the government, we will not know about that until after the next election. The government, very nicely, has made some decreases in certain areas of federal income tax for this year, but they will wham it to us as soon as they can with a draconian form of sales tax, which will come into effect, they say, in the next budget.

Honourable senators, I agree with its sponsor, Senator Flynn, that this bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I am sure that many other questions will be asked there, where I have no doubt the bill will be put in its proper perspective, as another attack on the pocketbooks of Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: This budget was written by Jesse James.

Senator Doody: No, by his brother, Frank.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Would Senator Buckwold entertain a question from a fellow Saskatchewanian? I was quite interested in the illusion he referred to. I believe I am quoting the senator correctly as having said, "All these taxes will have caused an increase in the cost of living for Canadians." Could the honourable senator please explain to me how the cost of living increment or the inflation factor has remained at four per cent during these years, whereas it was previously as high as 12 per cent and 13 per cent?

Senator Buckwold: The answer is relatively simple. I am just amazed that a native of Saskatchewan would not have the intelligence to grasp it immediately. I am going to have to talk to our former math teachers, because we went to the same high school so many years ago. As I said, the answer is relatively simple. Our inflation rate should not be 4 per cent or 5 per cent; our inflation rate right now should be 2 per cent or 2.5 per cent. I am suggesting that, had it not been for the kinds of policies this government has put forward, we would not be in that range of inflation.

Senator Barootes: Isn't 4 per cent considerably better than the 12.5 per cent that existed in 1983?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, and that was certainly brought well down by the former government, which saw a world condition of inflation and handled it immediately in a responsive and responsible way by introducing the kinds of controls that put the inflation rate into shape and into the proper order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: I think the Canadian record is as good as any in terms of controlling inflation during those times.

Senator Barootes: I would like to thank Senator Buckwold, "the illusionist," for explaining that to me.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Buckwold for his very apt remarks. Everything is relative as far as taxes are concerned.

I have two comments to make. First of all, about the delay, tax measures normally become effective on the day they are announced by the Minister of Finance, and the parliamentary process, or rather the time that process takes, depends far more on the opposition than on the government in these matters, and he knows that perfectly well. When he says this is a precedent, I think he is mistaken.

As for the problem about improving our finances, when I look at this government and when I look at the previous government, I am vastly relieved because I am sure we are doing a much better job.

The deficit has improved. Our tax system has been adjusted in favour of those who are in greatest need, since these taxes generally do not have a substantial impact on low-income groups.

In any case, people will always find a way to criticize measures that provide for tax increases. I understand that. As for the proper perspective sought by Senator Buckwold, I am sure the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, chaired by Senator Sinclair, will try to provide that perspective.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Flynn, bill referred to Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

EMERGENCIES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 3:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Petten,

That the following Senators be appointed to serve on the Steering Committee of the Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Cochrane, Frith, Hébert, Kelly, Marsden, Molgat and Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

● (1440)

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Although there is no chairman at the moment for the steering committee, would it be agreeable, honourable senators, that the committee meet when the Senate rises on Tuesday next, or at our next sitting?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders presented on Tuesday, May 31, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, this report deals with a change to the rule respecting the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. This matter arose out of a letter by the Honourable Senator Doody pointing out some difficulties in the wording of the old rule. The committee studied the matter carefully. The problem was that there could be a misunderstanding on the part of certain people that under the old rule the committee might not require the approval of the Senate itself for its measures, because rule 67(1)(g) simply said:

... and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

It could be deemed that that meant that if the committee reported, then it was deemed that their action had been approved. The feeling was that there should be proper approval by the Senate, as there is for every other committee of the Senate, and that the final decision on anything must be taken by the Senate itself.

Having studied this problem, the committee proposes the new wording which is in this report, which eliminates completely that matter of reporting and simply states what the committee can do. Then, because of that common rule that no committee can make any final decision without the approval of the Senate, the decisions of that committee will automatically require the approval of the Senate.

So that is how the rule reads presently.

After discussion in the Rules Committee it was agreed that we should send the rule to the Internal Economy Committee itself to make sure there was no disagreement on their part and that they understood what it was the Rules Committee was trying to do. This matter was discussed in the Internal Economy Committee and passed unanimously. Therefore, I recommend the rule to the Senate and move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eleventh report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (establishment of a standing committee), presented on Tuesday, May 31, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, this matter came to the attention of our committee, in the first instance, by a letter from the Atlantic Society of Fish & Wildlife Biologists. That group wrote to me on November 12, 1987, describing a meeting they had had and some of their concerns. They enclosed a resolution from the society which reads as follows:

Whereas the Senate of Canada does not have a standing environment committee, and whereas it is the duty of the Senate to consider and pass legislation that has received approval in the House of Commons before it can be proclaimed into law, and whereas a number of these bills are directly environmentally related while others have some environmental implication,

Therefore, be it resolved that the Atlantic Society of Fish and Wildlife Biologists urge the Senate of Canada to appoint a standing environment committee.

Approved at the annual meeting,
September 28, 1987.

Subsequent to that, a number of other letters arrived from various groups across the country, some of which referred to the resolution of the Atlantic Society of Fish & Wildlife Biologists. I believe a number of my colleagues received copies of that correspondence; I know that Senator Doody did.

The committee discussed this carefully—in fact in great detail—because it recognized the importance—indeed, the growing importance—of environmental matters and what a particular concern that is for our country, bearing in mind the difficulties we have had with our neighbour on the question of acid rain and the different problems that have arisen in northern Canada where the ecology is in particular danger.

Nevertheless, recognizing the importance of the item, the committee felt that the present rules provide ample opportunity for the discussion of environmental matters.

Honourable senators will know that environmental matters are specifically mentioned as being the responsibility of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. In addition to that committee's general responsibilities, it has four specific responsibilities. Rule 67(1)(o), subparagraph (iii), sets out environmental affairs. So the subject is specifically covered under the responsibilities of that committee.

In addition to that, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs could very easily be involved in environmental matters when it is involved in international questions such as acid rain. The Transport and Communications Committee could be involved in environmental matters, and has been. I am thinking of the transportation of dangerous goods in that regard. That committee has dealt with that subject before. The Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee could obviously be involved in any technical questions that might arise on environmental matters. The Agriculture and Forestry Committee has recently published a report entitled: "Soil at Risk". That report dealt with an environmental question. The Fisheries Committee equally has an interest in environmental matters. In fact, last week the Fisheries Committee was in Newfoundland and environmental matters did come up, particularly as they related to seals and pollution.

So the recommendation of the committee is that, because of the specific responsibilities of one committee, and the possibility of several other committees dealing with various aspects of the environment, and in view of the problems we have now relating to numbers, as well as the number of committees the Senate now has, we should not proceed with the establishment of a new committee.

I was requested to make this report to the Senate and obtain its approval before writing to the groups who have communicated with us. If the Senate adopts the report, letters will be prepared and sent to all groups explaining the decision.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Did Senator Molgat say during his brief description that other committees were requested to give their opinions? I just wonder why everybody involved could not have been consulted.

Senator Molgat: I do not believe I said that we consulted other committees.

Respecting item No. 10 on the order paper, I said that we consulted the Internal Economy Committee on the rule because that rule specifically affected the Internal Economy Committee. We thought that, out of courtesy to that committee, we ought to let the members of that committee know what the Rules Committee was recommending before bringing the recommendation to the Senate.

In this particular case we are not recommending any change to any rule and, therefore, we did not contact any other committee on the matter, because environmental affairs, as I have stated, are clearly already specified as the responsibility of one of our committees. We are proposing no change and, therefore, did not feel it was necessary to contact other committees.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 7, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 3572)

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

THURSDAY, June 2, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

FIFTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee recommends the following regulations for the Senators' Travel Policy:

In these regulations,

"Alternate" means a spouse (including common law), members of the immediate family and a member of the personal staff of the Senator;

"Region" means one of the following: the Atlantic Region, the Central Canada Region (Ontario and Quebec) and the Western Region.

1. 64 points allocated per calendar year. (no change)
2. All of the 64 points may be used by a Senator for travel, between Ottawa and a Senator's region and/or within the Senator's region. These trips are referred to as "regular" trips.
3. 20 of the 64 points may be used by a Senator for return trips from Ottawa or the Senator's Province to any destination in Canada. These trips are referred to as "National" trips.
4. 12 of the 20 points may be used by the Senator's spouse and/or alternate for National trips.
5. 18 of the 64 points may be used by the Senator's spouse and/or alternate for regular trips.
6. Travel within a Senator's region, regardless of distance travelled or mode of transportation, is counted as $\frac{1}{4}$ regular point for each return trip or for each leg of the trip between overnight stop-overs.
7. While travelling, a Senator and an alternate may claim, meals and accommodation expenses up to a maximum of two days, up to a limit of $120 per day, upon production of receipts.

8. A Senator and a spouse or one designated member of the immediate family are entitled to use all fares including first-class air fare and will be charged one (1) point for each return trip taken.
9. An alternate, other than the spouse or one designated member of the immediate family, who travels first class will be deducted $1\frac{1}{2}$ points for a return trip.
10. When a Senator deems it necessary to stop overnight during travel, he will be reimbursed for additional expenses supported by receipt resulting from different travel arrangements. Senators resident in the Yukon and Northwest Territories will be reimbursed for expenses such as overnight hotel accommodation and meals plus taxis.
11. Ground transportation to and from airports is reimbursed up to $18.00 without receipt. Taxi claims exceeding $18.00 must be accompanied by a receipt. (no change)
12. One-day car rental charges, each way, supported by receipts, for an intermediate car is permitted as a travel claim or option where appropriate and reasonable, in lieu of taxis or other means of transportation.
13. When travel is undertaken by car, the total claim must not exceed the equivalent rate for first class air fare. Reimbursement for distance travelled will be made at the rate of 25.1 cents per kilometer. (no change)
14. When Senators travel in a carpool, or otherwise share transportation, the Senator who provides the transportation will be reimbursed his or her regular entitlement with each accompanying Senator eligible to claim 25% of that entitlement. Travel points will be deducted in the regular manner for those Senators being reimbursed.

The same would apply to Senator's alternates.

15. No points are deducted when free rail transportation is used unless meal, ground transportation or accommodation charges are claimed. Points will be deducted at one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) the normal rate.

expenditures must be attached to travel expense claims. (no change)

Respectfully submitted,

GUY CHARBONNEAU

JOINT COMMITTEE CHANGE OF NAME—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of the Standing Joint Committee for Regulatory Scrutiny had been changed to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-115, to amend the Indian Act and another act in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time.

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, June 9, 1988.

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its twenty-third report on the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 1 1989. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate and Minutes of the Proceedings in order that it be part of the Senate's permanent record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 3611.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Royce Frith, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 7, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

FIFTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on Senators' Research Expenditures for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee with respect to its review of applications for research expenditures, as authorized by the Senate on May 3, 1988. The said budget is as follows:

Other expenditures	$ 1,000
Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SPRING SESSION, FUNCHAL, MADEIRA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 14, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the spring session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Funchal, Madeira, from May 26 to 30, 1988.

I might mention, honourable senators, that my whip has instructed me that when I do get around to making that report I must be very brief, and I promised him I shall be!

ENERGY

TAR SANDS PROCESSING PLANT, FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL COMMITMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, last Thursday I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could give us some information respecting the financing arrangements that have been worked out by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Energy for Alberta. The leader gave an undertaking that he would try to bring that information to the Senate today.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am pleased to report that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the information which I placed on the record the other day is accurate.

Senator Olson: I did not question that. I wondered if the information in the newspapers was accurate, as we were led to believe, because the minister did not reply as to whether a financing arrangement had been worked out between the two levels of government.

Senator Murray: I thought I had answered that question. Subject to confirmation, I had answered that question in the negative, and the negative it is. A financing arrangement has not been worked out between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta.

Senator Olson: I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could then give us an undertaking to provide a more complete and detailed explanation of what the situation is so that the people who will be directly affected by this decision will have something to go by other than the speculation of some reporters.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we and our friends in the government of Alberta are still reviewing the proposal put forward by the consortium. We expect to be in a position to provide a response to the consortium in the very near future.

Senator Olson: Could the Leader of the Government give us some definition of what he means by the "near future"? In other words, may I ask what "soon" means?

Senator Murray: I am afraid I cannot be more specific than I have been. If I obtain any more precise information from my colleague, Mr. Masse, who is directly concerned with these matters, I shall be glad to convey it to the Senate.

Senator Frith: It is sooner than "in due course."

Senator Murray: Definitely, definitely.

FUR INDUSTRY

PROPOSED BRITISH LABELLING OF CANADIAN PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the impending decision by the British government to change the labelling on Canadian furs will have a serious effect on northern Canadians, and the aboriginal peoples in particular, what plans does the government have to take further action vis-à-vis the British government in this regard?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we have protested in the strongest terms to the United Kingdom government, not once but on several occasions concerning this matter. We, for our part, are considering what further action to take. The honourable senator will be aware that there is a possibility—or will be—of instituting some action under the GATT; but these matters are still being considered by the government.

Senator Molgat: In view of the proposed purchase of British submarines—a decision with which I do not necessarily agree—is it the intention of our government to let Her Majesty's government know that perhaps its actions will have some effect upon our decisions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I prefer to take that question as notice.

Senator Frith: Long notice, I am sure!

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government on a subject matter in which I know he has a long and abiding interest; that is, the interest rate set by the Bank of Canada every Thursday at 2 o'clock. I can remember, for example, that he asked that question of me every Thursday afternoon. Could he now advise us whether the government is going to take any action in an effort to see that justice is done in this regard? Many people, including me, believe that much of the country is being penalized because of some fear of the government or the governor of the bank with respect to inflationary pressure in a small geographical area of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I should like to draw to the attention of the honourable senator the fact that the fiscal policy of the government, the social policy of the government and the regional development policy of the government are all such as to mitigate the effects of high interest rates on less favoured people and on less favoured regions of the country. I should have thought that he would be congratulating the government on the initiative that it has taken in that regard.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is that not the way in which you always answered the question, Senator Olson? Is that not the same answer you used to give Senator Murray when he asked the same question?

Senator Olson: No, it is not, because I always expressed a view on the monetary policy of the government, too. I noticed that the Leader of the Government carefully, or deliberately, refrained from commenting on whether this is the monetary policy of the government.

Senator Frith: Good point!

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that the government has no monetary policy, or that it agrees with what the Governor of the Bank of Canada is doing.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is familiar, I presume, with the legislation governing the Bank of Canada and its relationship with the government. If there had been any question of disagreement on a policy matter as between the government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, he would have heard about it by now.

Senator Olson: May I ask whether he has heard about it by now? Has the Governor of the Bank of Canada heard from the government with respect to the largest increase in the bank rate in the last three and a half years?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can assure Senator Olson that the government has certainly not taken the kind of drastic action provided for under the legislation. He will be aware of the undoubted economic progress we have made in the last three and a half years and the serious threat to that progress that would be posed by any refuelling of inflation in Canada. And while I do not make their sentiments necessarily my own, Senator Olson will have seen the statements attributed to responsible business leaders in this country that the recent Ontario budget has made quite a significant contribution to the inflationary threat to this country.

Senator Olson: On the road to Damascus!

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CONSULTATIONS ON DESIGN OF FERRY—RELOCATION OF TERMINAL

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I was pleased to see that on Friday, May 27, 1988, when the Minister of Transport was in Prince Edward Island, he boarded a ferry at Wood Island, Caribou. I was also pleased to hear his announcement that the government would spend $45 million on the acquisition of a new ferry and on the construction of wharves in that area of Prince Edward Island. It makes me think that an election is coming up in the fall or the spring, because the improvements to the ferry system are not supposed to be made until 1990 or 1991.

[Senator Murray.]

● (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): They have to start building it, you know.

Senator Bonnell: Yes, we understand that.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if the good people of Prince Edward Island will be consulted on the planning and architectural design of these ferries? The people of Prince Edward Island would know what would best suit them for logging transportation to New Glasgow and Pictou and the transportation of potatoes from the eastern part of the province. They would know the type of ferry that would best suit that part of the country.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall inquire of my colleague, Mr. Bouchard, the Minister of Transport, what consultations he may be undertaking in that respect.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I note that $15 million of that money is to be used for the construction of a new terminal. Apparently a two-level ferry is to be built that will accommodate 150 cars and trucks. The present ferry has only one level and uses a single level loading dock; hence the new terminal.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask the Minister of Transport to consider changing one of the terminals from Caribou to Caribou Gully? If the terminal were located at Caribou Gully, that would cut off a distance of four-and-a-half kilometres and would allow the ferry travelling from Prince Edward Island to Nova Scotia to make the trip in 45 minutes rather than one-and-a-half hours. Consequently, that same ferry, being able to travel back and forth much more quickly, could make twice as many trips per day and would not have to travel through the narrows, which have to be dredged every year. Assuming a new terminal is to be built, would the Leader of the Government ask the minister to consider moving it to Caribou Gully?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall certainly draw those representations to Mr. Bouchard's attention.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER AND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I appreciate that he will have to take it as notice, but I would be grateful if he could prioritize it, because it has importance for all officers of the Correctional Service of Canada.

In the last two weeks there have been two resignations from the Correctional Service of Canada: that of Mr. Rhéal LeBlanc, Commissioner, Correctional Service Canada; and that of Mr. Gordon Pinder, Deputy Commissioner, Correctional Service Canada and Director of Program Training. These untimely resignations have had a disturbing effect on all officers of the Correctional Service. Would the Leader of the Government consult his colleague, the Solicitor General of Canada, and make a statement with respect to this situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall consult Mr. Kelleher, but I have no reason to believe that the resignation of the commissioner, which I knew about before it was drawn to my attention by Senator Hastings, was anything but normal. It was done in the normal course and for normal reasons. The retiring commissioner has, as I understand it, plans of his own. To that I can only add that an announcement will be made shortly naming an acting commissioner.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another question concerning Prince Edward Island. I noticed in the Evening Patriot of June 6, 1988, that the Premier and the Minister of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island, as well as Mr. Orville Willis, manager of O'Leary Potato Packers, are quite concerned about 40 million pounds of potatoes that did not grow to full size last year because of the drought in Prince Edward Island. Apparently they will be unable to sell those potatoes, because they are small in size and did not develop. They are simply in storage and are worth about $5 million to the potato industry of Prince Edward Island.

Since the Government of Canada is considering drought assistance for western Canada—which is a good thing, and I want to support it one hundred per cent—will they also consider it for eastern Canada and for the Prince Edward Island potato farmers who are about to lose approximately $5 million in sales of potatoes because of the 40 million pounds of underdeveloped potatoes caused by the drought?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess that I had not seen the report in the Evening Patriot to which the honourable senator refers, nor had that particular situation been drawn to my attention personally.

I shall ask the federal Minister of Agriculture whether he has anything to report on the matter.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you. I will be pleased to send you a copy to keep you informed, if your office does not have one.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF ONTARIO BUDGET ON INTEREST RATES

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government care to arrange for someone to explain how the Ontario budget affects interest rates, because

I have consulted some economists on this and they do not see how? Could he perhaps explain to us why the Ontario budget, which, by increasing taxes to some extent and therefore taking the standard Conservative approach to slowing down an economy, has contributed to a firing up of the economy and increasing the fear of an increase in the inflation rate?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only offer to send to the honourable senator copies of the reports which I have seen—perhaps he has not seen them—quoting quite senior business leaders in this country as attributing to the Ontario budget precisely that effect, namely, the effect of increasing the danger of an increase in inflation in this country.

Senator Gigantès: I thank the honourable Leader of the Government. I shall be looking forward to reading the elaborations of his business friends.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators I have answers to two questions. One question was asked on June 1, 1988, by Senator Denis, regarding the filling of vacancies in the Senate, and the other was asked on June 2, 1988, by Senator Graham, regarding the Cape Breton Development Corporation presidency.

I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings, if honourable senators agree.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Would you please read mine, if it is not too long?

Senator Doody: Certainly.

THE SENATE

FILLING OF VACANCIES—REASONS FOR DELAY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): To my knowledge, Nova Scotia is the only province, other than Newfoundland, that has initiated consultations on a Senate appointment and those consultations are being pursued. It is open equally to the Prime Minister or the premier of a province to initiate such consultations.

Hon. Azellus Denis: May I ask about the other provinces that have vacancies?

Senator Doody: Well, the answer indicates that the other provinces have not opened discussions on the vacancies. However, I will ask if there is any other information available and bring it forward to you.

Senator Denis: It is not the duty of the government to ask them for consultations.

Senator Doody: Once again, the answer indicates that it is open to either party to open the consultations.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PRESIDENCY—APPOINTMENT TO FILL VACANCY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 2, 1988, by the Honourable Alasdair Graham, regarding Cape Breton Development Corporation—Presidency—Appointment to Fill Vacancy.

(The answer follows:)

At the request of the government, the Board of Directors instituted a lengthy search for qualified candidates and, based on the Board's recommendations, the government is now concluding its selection process. In this regard, the government hopes to complete arrangements for an appointment very shortly.

Until a formal appointment is announced and, with her full concurrence, the Board of Directors has made the necessary arrangements to extend Dr. MacNeil's acting appointment as President and CEO of Devco.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

MOTION TO INSTRUCT NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO DIVIDE BILL C-103 INTO TWO BILLS—SPEAKER'S RULING NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed with Orders of the Day, the Chair was asked for a ruling on the motion of Senator Graham last Wednesday. If I may, I will now give the Chair's ruling.

[Translation]

On Wednesday, June 1, the Chair was asked to rule on the acceptability of the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham:

That it be an instruction of this House to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that it divide Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, into two Bills, in order that it may deal separately with Part I, entitled the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and Part II, entitled Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

In the discussion which followed, all Senators agreed that this motion was somewhat unusual to the proceedings of the Senate. It is for this reason that the Chair wanted to delay its ruling which had been promised for last Thursday. I wish to apologize to all honourable senators who may have been inconvenienced by this delay, but the matter is of such importance that more time was required to fully consider the point of order raised by Senator Flynn and the comments made by Senator MacEachen, Senator Stewart and Senator Molgat.

[Senator Doody.]

The issue before us is whether it is in order, within the procedures of the Senate, to move a mandatory instruction to a committee that Bill C-103, a bill passed by the House of Commons and sent to the Senate for concurrence, be divided into two separate bills. As Senator Stewart succinctly noted on Wednesday, Senators must ask themselves what reasons could there be for prohibiting the moving of such a motion.

In deciding this question, it is usual to examine the precedents for similar motions. After searching the Senate Journals, no Senate precedent can be found. With respect to House of Commons precedents, it does not appear that the House of Commons has ever divided a Senate bill. With respect to the House of Lords, Erskine May states on page 502:

Only one attempt has been made to divide a bill brought from the Commons . . . and this was defeated. But the instruction was objected to on its merits as well as on its unprecedented nature and the technical difficulties it would create, so that the propriety of dividing a Commons Bill has not been decided.

● (1420)

[English]

With respect to Australian procedure, Odger's Australian Senate Practice, Third Edition, states on page 214, "No precedent can be found in the records for an Instruction for the division or consolidation of Bills . . .".

The Chair feels that searching for precedents, in this instance, is not very helpful. With respect to the motion made in the Lords on July 29, 1919, Erskine May states that the propriety of an Upper Chamber dividing a bill from the Lower Chamber has not been decided. The 1919 motion would have been a more useful precedent had a Speaker's ruling been given. That no such ruling was rendered did not prove, in my opinion, that the motion was procedurally acceptable. Erskine May notes that "in the enforcement of rules for maintaining order, the Speaker of the Lords has no more authority than any other Lord, except in so far as his own personal weight and dignity of his office may give effect to his opinions and secure the concurrence of the House. As a consequence, the responsibility for maintaining order during debate rests with the House as a Whole. The Leader of the House has a special part to play in expressing the sense of the House and in drawing attention to cases where the rules of procedure have been transgressed or abused."

The Chair has reviewed the debate in the Lords in 1919 and notes that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Lytton) raised certain procedural problems which would occur if such a motion was adopted. In any event, the 1919 precedent, in my opinion, remains somewhat tenuous.

The lack of precedents does not in itself prohibit the acceptability of Senator Graham's motion. Without precedents, senators must examine the motion as it is presented to us and decide if it contravenes any procedural rules under which this chamber operates.

The Chair finds that on many grounds the motion presents no procedural difficulties. Proper notice was given of the motion. The Chair feels that, as a general principle, instructions to divide bills may be moved in the Senate when the bills originate in the Senate, as they may be moved in the House of Commons when they originate in that House. With respect to Beauchesne's citation 761(2), that "such an Instruction is in order only if the bill is drafted into two or more distinct parts or else comprising more than one subject matter...", the Chair agrees with the Leader of the Opposition that Bill C-103 is capable, from a drafting point of view, of being easily divided.

The main procedural problem, the Chair feels, lies with the nature of Bill C-103 itself. It is a government bill and a money bill, having been recommended by Her Excellency the Governor General. Senator Graham's motion is quite clear that the National Finance Committee will be instructed to divide Bill C-103 into two bills. Erskine May states, on page 564, that, when an instruction has been given to the committee that a bill may be divided into two or more bills, "the separate bills have been separately reported."

[Translation]

If it is divided, Bill C-103 will no longer be on the Senate Order Paper but will be superseded by two separate bills. The Chair notes there could be a technical problem with the numbering of such bills but feels such practical difficulties could be worked out. The Chair has a problem in accepting that these two separate bills are still government bills. Senator Graham's instruction does not deal with amending a government bill, but with dividing a government bill into two bills. These two bills would therefore have found their way before Parliament, not in the House of Commons, but in the Senate. Since they would both be bills appropriating public money, it would appear to the Chair that such action would be in contravention of Section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867 which states,

"Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons".

For this very important reason, I must conclude that the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham is not in order.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I must with considerable dismay advise the Senate that in view of the citations I quoted last Wednesday from pages 229 and 230 of Beauchesne's, regretfully I have no alternative but to appeal the Chair's ruling.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who wish to sustain my ruling please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who oppose my ruling please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

● (1430)

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

● (1440)

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

The ruling of His Honour the Speaker was negated on the following division:

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-51, to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products.

She said: Honourable senators, even the most jaded observers of the parliamentary scene have resorted to superlatives to describe the passage of the two bills relating to tobacco products—Bill C-51 and Bill C-204. The Globe and Mail hailed “unprecedented action by the House of Commons,” while Jeffrey Simpson, in his usual purple prose, referred to a “wonderfully iconoclastic series of developments” and dubbed as heroes both the Honourable Jake Epp and Lynn McDonald.

Frankly, in view of the lethal nature of the product in question, recently cited in the Surgeon General's report as comparable in its addictive qualities to heroin and cocaine and targeted by the industry in its marketing strategy to those most classic of victims, women and children, I consider the measures proposed in both bills to be relatively mild in nature. But the forceful attempts on the part of an irresponsible industry to stop passage of the bills and the positioning of Bill C-51 as part of the government's national program to reduce tobacco use demand a response of applause and approval for the success achieved, and I certainly share in those sentiments. I am happy to have the honour to speak for Bill C-51 in the Senate.

The president of the Canadian Medical Association, in his appearance before the legislative committee on Bills C-51 and C-204, called these bills “the most important proposed federal legislation for preventative medicine in decades”; legislation comparable in terms of disease prevention and health promotion to laws requiring the pasteurization of milk and the chlorination of water.

The purpose of Bill C-51, to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products—the Tobacco Products Control Act—is stated in clause 3 of the bill, namely: to protect the health of Canadians in the light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of many debilitating and fatal diseases; to protect young people from inducements to use tobacco and thus become addicted, that is, to eliminate future smokers, if possible; and to enhance public awareness of the hazards of tobacco use.

Briefly, the essence of the bill is to outlaw gradually advertising of tobacco in all media; to put tight restrictions on tobacco company sponsorship of cultural and sporting events; to prohibit free promotional distribution of tobacco products—cash rebates and games or contests designed to encourage tobacco use; and to require tobacco companies to include more detailed and explicit health warnings on cigarette packages. This bill, however, is just one part of a wide-ranging government anti-smoking policy begun in 1985. Recognizing smoking as Canada's leading public health problem, as the number one cause of preventable death and disease in this country, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, together with provincial ministers and major health groups, made a joint commitment to develop a national program to reduce tobacco use, a program aimed at promoting and eventually achieving a smoke-free society. The impact of tobacco marketing activities has been identified in the national programs policy statement as a major hindrance in the reduction of smoking, most especially among youth. In testimony before the House legislative committee, tobacco companies testified that they were targeting their market toward young people in order to make sure that they were marketing their product correctly to their customers.

Before describing the specific measures of the bill in more detail, perhaps it is important for the record in this chamber—although thousands of words of testimony have been offered in the House of Commons—to again delineate the context against which this bill comes forward.

As has been stated previously, cigarette smoking is the single most important cause of preventable illness and premature death in Canada. No other legal product, when used as directed, produces such terrible effects. One of the members of the House of Commons said, “Le tabagisme; c'est vraiment un fléau”—34,000 to 36,000 deaths annually in Canada are related to smoking.

Thirty per cent of all cancer deaths, 30 per cent of heart disease deaths and 85 per cent of chronic obstructive lung disease deaths are caused by tobacco use. Smoking is directly linked as well to a variety of upper respiratory infections, chronic bronchitis and emphysema, strokes, peripheral artery diseases, peptic ulcer disease, as well as cancers of the mouth, throat, esophagus, kidney, bladder and pancreas.

In 1988 an estimated 13,000 people will die of lung cancer, most of them as a result of smoking. Lung cancer soon will replace breast cancer as the most prevalent form of cancer among Canadian women.

Some women are particularly susceptible to smoking-related illness. Smokers who use oral contraceptives are ten times more likely to suffer fatal heart disease. Pregnant smokers suffer more vaginal bleeding, spontaneous abortions and fetal death.

Low birthweight in children of smokers has been linked to development problems as late as age 11.

It has been estimated in a study in the Canadian Medical Association's Journal in 1987 that about 300 non-smokers die annually from lung cancer induced by exposure to other people's tobacco smoke. Sidestream smoke is more toxic than inhaled smoke, containing four times as much of the carcinogens as the inhaled smoke.

Use of smokeless tobacco—chewing tobacco and snuff—has become widespread in the Northwest Territories. Smokeless tobacco causes cancer of the mouth, pharynx, larynx and esophagus. It also causes a variety of dental problems.

Most importantly, the level of awareness in Canada about some of the serious hazards of cigarette smoking is very low. In a Gallup national omnibus study in 1987, paid for by the Canadian Cancer Society and by the Non-Smokers Rights Association, Canadians were asked about perceived health hazards related to smoking. An astounding 71 per cent did not know that smoking causes heart diseases, while 59 per cent did not mention lung cancer. Obviously, these results suggest that the health education efforts of agencies working in the health field cannot compete against tobacco advertising—in the words of the World Health Organization, the “intensive and ruthless promotional campaigns of the trans-national tobacco companies.” Advertising reinforces and may help create a climate of social acceptability for smoking, what the minister has called “a falsely alluring image.”

In Canada the tobacco industry has spent $96 million a year on advertising, primarily to recruit young smokers. The insidious part of this is that this marketing of tobacco products results in addictive behaviour, which usually begins before adulthood.

Canada is one of the top ten countries in the world in per capita consumption of cigarettes—50 per cent higher than in Norway and Finland, where advertising has been banned. Approximately 34 per cent of all Canadians over 18 smoke, one-quarter of Canadian teenagers smoke daily, and, sadly, although the proportion of smokers in Canada has been decreasing, the number of young Canadian women smoking continues to increase. In testimony before the House committee, the Minister of National Health and Welfare estimated that health and other related costs of smoking were in excess of $7 billion in 1982 figures.

Now, as to the specific provisions of Bill C-51, they include the following: First, with regard to advertising, all advertising in magazines and newspapers would be banned as of January 1, 1989, at which time a voluntary ban on broadcast advertisements would also become mandatory.

Second, billboards, transit posters and the like will be phased out at the rate of one-third of their monetary value and cease on January 1, 1991. Tobacco product advertisements already in place at the retailer's place of business can remain until January 1, 1993.

A sub-amendment introduced in committee mandates that any new brand name billboards or posters put in place after the coming into force of the act will have to include any health warnings that may be prescribed by the government.

Businesses with names like “Cigar Store” or “Smoke Shop” can continue to be so named indefinitely; however, the name of the business could not be used in association with a tobacco product advertisement.

In the legislative committee, tobacco sponsorship recipients involved in sports and cultural activities expressed concerns about restrictions on brand name tobacco sponsorship, although many of them were in favour of the bill. The legislation passed on May 31 allows brand name sponsorship agreements in place as of January 25, 1988, to continue, but only at the 1987 level. Tobacco manufacturers can thus spend the same total amount on these activities as they did in 1987, and how long they continued to do this would depend solely on the terms of the contracts already in place on January 25, 1988. However, no product logo or cigarette depictions are allowed in association with these sponsorships. Unlimited sponsorship using the full corporate name of a tobacco manufacturer would be possible as long as these funds were not added on to an existing brand name sponsorship. This limitation preserves the funding ceiling for brand name activities.

The purpose of the amended sponsorship provisions is to limit tobacco sponsorship using brand names to conditions less likely to promote the use of tobacco products.

Other important provisions of the bill include the prohibition both of free distribution of tobacco product samples and the use of rebates, prizes, contests or other promotional gimmicks.

Tobacco brand names and trademarks may not be used on non-tobacco goods except those already in existence or ordered by the date of first reading of the bill. A further exemption applies to established companies who already have a major line of business in non-tobacco goods that carry a brand name also used on cigarettes.

Health warnings will be mandated for the first time and will be prescribed by the government and authorization is given to demand that detailed inserts be placed in packaging to warn consumers more fully.

One of the reasons given for the inclusion of this provision is because the list of hazardous and toxic substances is so long that you would never get it all on one package. Therefore, it has to be put into an insert. This is the way that drug prescriptions are sold.

Health messages can appear on all tobacco product packaging. This is an innovation. Toxic substances in tobacco are to be reported to federal authorities and listed prominently on packaging. Hopefully this will eliminate such jokes as the current warning which states, “Warning Health & Welfare Canada advises that danger to health increases with the amount smoked—avoid inhaling,” and will permit warnings about the addictiveness of tobacco and the diseases it causes such as lung cancer, heart disease or fetal injury and spontaneous abortion caused by maternal smoking.

Another major provision of the bill was the retention of civil liability on the part of tobacco product manufacturers for the safety of tobacco products. The act may not be construed as a legal defence in any civil liability case that may arise—that is, the legal requirement that health warnings to be prescribed by the government be placed on tobacco packaging would not preclude any decision by the courts that manufacturers may still be liable to consumers for the hazards of their products.

Honourable senators, there are a couple of other points I would like to make about this bill.

First, some good arguments were made in the House committee against the contention of those who argued, as the tobacco industry will surely argue in the courts, that the government bill is inconsistent with the freedom of speech provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms—an argument to which senators are becoming increasingly sensitive and with which they are becoming increasingly familiar. I will only repeat some of them here. The right to freedom of speech, it was said in committee, surely does not supersede the right to health; the right of families to be free from suffering; the right of a child not to be involuntarily abused by smoke; and the right of a person not to be assaulted by smoke pollution of the air.

Limits now exist on the freedom of speech and on commercial speech—that is, advertising. Physicians are not allowed, ethically or legally, to advertise their services to the public. The law prohibits the advocating of suicide or the promotion of street drugs, such as speed, many of which are no more addictive than tobacco. All prescription drugs are legal to sell but illegal to advertise to the public. Many limits on the concept of free speech exist in a democratic society as a response to those problems caused by licence in the exercise of free speech. Mr. David Hill, National Vice-President of the Canadian Cancer Society, put it very well when he said, as reported at page 16-103 of Hansard:

By invoking free speech in its opposition to Bill C-51 ... by attempting to cast a phasing out of tobacco advertising as an attack on consumer choice, the industry disregards strong legal precedent for measures to protect the public from hazardous products and shield children from advertising, the accuracy of which they are ill-equipped to evaluate.

The argument in favour of the consumer's right to choose his own poison cannot stand up to scrutiny when the consumer is deliberately victimized, endangered and duped by an irresponsible industry peddling misrepresented addictive and lethal products. There is little freedom in addition, on a cancer ward or in a chronic-care facility of any hospital.

No discussion of Bill C-51 would be complete without mention of the efforts of a coalition of voluntary organizations, most of them health organizations, without whose consistent, determined and brilliant advocacy this bill could not have been a reality. In a sense, the tobacco industry is hoisted with its own petard. The tobacco industry, vaunted for its marketing strategy, used that skill in an attempt to defeat the bill; the coalition groups matched and exceeded the industry through an advertising campaign in support of the bill—and a lobbying campaign, I might add.

If the industry made statements that were not only preposterous but also dangerous to their fellow human beings—such as denying that the link between smoking and disease has been proven—the coalition cited facts more chilling than fiction, such as there are in fact now over 50,000 scientific studies from a variety of cultures around the world showing that smoking causes cancer and other diseases. A fascinating contest in which the good guys won, we hope!

Senator Frith: Which is it—that they were good, or that they won?

Senator Spivak: Let us hope that this same coalition lives on to battle against other environmental hazards threatening human health and survival—for example, mosquitoes in Manitoba or the armaments industry.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, these coalitions, the government, concerned members of the House and the public are looking for speedy passage of these bills. It is twenty-one and a half years since the Canadian Medical Association first recommended to Parliament that it prohibit tobacco advertising. I hope that we all agree that that is long enough to wait and that we should pass these bills quickly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I propose to support this bill, but I must confess frankly that it has been difficult for me to come to that decision. Tobacco is still a legal product in our country, and I think it is a serious matter for us to deny the right to advertise, a form of free speech, as Senator Spivak pointed out in her very good presentation of the arguments in favour of supporting the bill. It still troubles me that we are prohibiting freedom of speech in the form of advertising in relation to the sale of a product which is still legal in our country. However, I have thought about this matter for a long time. I have discussed it with a good many of my medical friends whose opinions I respect. I have read carefully all the information which has been sent to me as a senator, both by the various coalitions who are in favour of this legislation and of Bill C-204 and by the tobacco manufacturing industry in their attempts to show that the restraining of advertising in certain other countries of the world has not had a noticeable effect in reducing the amount of smoking in those countries. In other words, the two countries to which Senator Spivak referred had a lower level of use of tobacco prior to the ban on advertising. Of course, they have maintained a lower level since advertising has been forbidden.

I must also say that I was impressed by a very good letter from the Canadian Teachers' Federation representing views of the many hundreds of thousands of teachers throughout this country who have come to the conclusion—correctly, I think, because I have questioned some of them in my own province of Nova Scotia—that advertising does in fact have an influence on very young people and that it does contribute toward their adoption of this dangerous habit. I am convinced now beyond any doubt—five years ago I was not—that the use of tobacco is a dangerous health hazard and does, in fact, lead to a much greater increase in the incidence of disease and death in respect not only to cancer but to certain heart diseases, respiratory ailments and so on.

So, having regard to all these arguments and to the danger of the product whose advertising we are banning, I propose to support the legislation. I suspect that it will be tested in the courts and it will be interesting to see what the courts decide. It may be that we or our successors here in the not-too-distant future will be faced with the question of whether we should make the use of tobacco illegal. I must say that I think I would start off being pretty well opposed to that idea. It did not work with prohibition. In a recent edition of Time magazine there was even rather intelligent speculation as to whether we might be able to control the use of drugs better if some were made legally available. In any event, this is all beyond the arguments that go with this legislation. As I say, with the reservations I have referred to, I have decided, with some reluctance, I may say—I have never smoked at all during my life, so I have no personal involvement whatsoever—to support Bill C-51 and also Bill C-204 when it comes before us.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Spivak with regard to the proposed Free Trade Agreement. By the way, I support the bill. I am a non-smoker now, because I had to stop, and, thank God, I was able to. I, too, like Senator Hicks, have some reservations about the legality of this legislation and about what will happen when we pull out all these restraints. We in New Brunswick have forbidden the advertisement of liquor, but we are nevertheless flooded with advertising from Quebec, the State of Maine and other areas through television and magazines advertising beers, wines and liquors of all kinds. I would like to ask Senator Spivak: Will there not be a tendency by the tobacco companies to increase the amount of advertising they do in foreign magazines and on foreign television and radio stations?

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, this point—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Spivak, perhaps you should wait until honourable senators have discussed the principles of the bill, after which you will have all the time you want to answer questions.

Senator Hicks: Surely the honourable senator can answer the question that was put to her directly by Senator Thériault.

Senator Thériault: Your Honour, I asked permission to ask a question. Are you now ruling that I cannot—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If it is not considered that the honourable senator is closing the debate in answering your question, then she may so answer.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, this question was discussed quite thoroughly in the House committee meetings.

Apparently 65 per cent of advertising of tobacco and tobacco products is now done in American magazines. However, the point is that these magazines cannot advertise Canadian cigarettes. They can advertise only American cigarettes. A very small percentage of American cigarettes is accepted by the Canadian public. I think it is something like 1 or 2 per cent.

Senator Thériault: Under what law are companies prevented from advertising Canadian cigarettes in American magazines?

Senator Spivak: It is my understanding that this legislation prevents Canadian companies from advertising Canadian cigarettes, but I can check on that.

Senator Thériault: In other countries?

Senator Spivak: No Canadian company can advertise Canadian cigarettes in such publications, though those publications can advertise American cigarettes. I would point out that this applies only to magazines. You must remember that there is a voluntary ban by the broadcasting industry in the United States on cigarettes, as there is in Canada. We do not know what the Americans are likely to do as a result of this bill. I hope they will be as convinced by the arguments as are some other countries which were consulted with regard to this legislation, countries such as Australia and New Zealand. We hope that the Americans will look at this very good example in Canada and perhaps introduce similar legislation, or at least continue the voluntary ban. No one can remain immune forever to the disastrous effects of a product like this and take no action, particularly when the advertising is targeted toward, as I said, women and young children. That is my understanding as to the provisions with regard to American advertisements.

Senator Thériault: Will this legislation interfere in any way with the proposed Free Trade Agreement?

Senator Spivak: I asked this question of officials and apparently the Free Trade Agreement is not an issue here.

Senator Thériault: Perhaps it is not an issue now, but could it become an issue?

Senator Spivak: My understanding is that it is not the issue. On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-204, to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I should point out, first of all, honourable senators, that Senator Haidasz now has two bills in his name amending the Hazardous Products Act, S-4 and C-204. Beauchesne's paragraph 701(3) says:

... if a decision of the House has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions and such a bill could not have been introduced on a motion for leave.

Honourable senators, it is my understanding that Bill S-4 has received second reading and been referred to committee. Therefore, I suggest the procedure we should follow is to have Senator Haidasz dispose of S-4 before proceeding with C-204.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe the citation referred to by Senator Phillips refers to an introduction of two bills in the same house, not to a bill from one house that arrives in the other house while it is considering a similar bill introduced there. Otherwise, if you interpreted it the way Senator Phillips has, you could paralyze Parliament. If that were true, then by introducing a bill in one house you could prevent anything being done in the other house. I am sure that the intention in Beauchesne's is to prevent its happening in the same house.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: That is a very interesting argument, coming from Senator Frith, that he is afraid of paralyzing Parliament. He has been doing his best to do that here for three years.

Senator Frith: "I," paralyze Parliament? Have you looked at the number of bills that have been passed by this Parliament? Are you not proud of them? Was that paralysis? Don't talk such nonsense, for goodness sake! Speak to the point of order.

Senator Flynn: I hit a very sensitive spot.

Hon. H.A. Olson: No, no. You are dealing with the facts now. That is the problem.

Senator Flynn: In any event, the fact is that we have already decided in principle on Bill S-4 and we cannot make a similar decision a second time in the same session. That is the case. Perhaps Senator Haidasz prefers this bill to his own, S-4. In that case, perhaps he could withdraw his first bill and concentrate on this one. We certainly cannot deal with two bills covering the same ground during the same session. That seems to me to be obvious.

Senator Haidasz: I should like to speak to Senator Phillips' point of order. I do not know whether His Honour the Speaker will want to make a ruling. Bill S-4 has been in committee for a year and a half. The members of the committee actually wanted to study all bills on tobacco smoking at the same time. It was my intention—and it still is now—to amend Bill S-4. In other words, it will be somewhat different from Bill C-204, if it is approved by the committee.

Senator Flynn: I think you validate the point of order raised by Senator Phillips, if you intend to make your bill absolutely similar.

• (1520)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that we adjourn the debate on the point of order and reflect on this overnight to see if we can come to some understanding, because it seems to me that the Senate does want to deal with this subject. I am sure that we can find a way to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it the wish of the Senate that I give a ruling on this now or that the debate be adjourned?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that we adjourn the debate on the point of order. It may be that we will not have to ask for a ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we adjourn the debate on the point of order?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to know whether I can proceed with the second reading of Bill C-204 or must wait until tomorrow to hear His Honour's ruling?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, a motion has already been put and accepted that we adjourn the debate on the point of order until the next sitting of the Senate. Senator Haidasz cannot proceed with second reading now. Senator Haidasz will have to wait until an arrangement has been made between the two parties or until I make a ruling, but Senator Frith has moved that we adjourn the debate on the point of order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are actually adjourning both the debate on the point of order and the debate on the motion standing in the name of Senator Haidasz.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that we adjourn both matters, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on 25th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Hébert).

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, those of you who did not have to sit on the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to consider Bill S-7 on Opus Dei should consider themselves blessed by the Gods! They were spared long and tedious discussions, the sickly sweet and ambiguous evidence of the rare witnesses who did appear, among others the Reverend Haddock, leader of Opus Dei in Canada, and a few lawyers.

Very early on an attitude prevailed within the committee, an attitude which all of us did not take but which did get the sometimes tacit approval of the majority of committee members, to wit: the committee—and the Senate, undoubtedly—does not have to question the relevance of Opus Dei tenets and its equivocal origins in Spain under Franco for whom the movement did feel genuine sympathy. Nor were we to be concerned over the many scandals which have highlighted the history of Opus Dei in Spain, France, Italy and elsewhere, scandals of a financial nature in most cases. We were to refuse to hear evidence from outstanding Catholics, priests and laymen alike, who vigorously denounced Opus Dei, even in Canada. We were to disregard serious complaints from Canadian parents whose young children have been indoctrinated by Opus Dei, much in the same manner as other children were indoctrinated by Moonists, Scientologists, Khrishnas or other bizarre cults. Nor were we even to hear the testimony of a former colleague, Jean Le Moyne, whose expertise in such matters has been acknowledged even by the Catholic hierarchy that had sought his advice about the position the Canadian Church should take during the Vatican II Council. In short, the committee could not have cared less and decided an examination of the legal aspect of the Opus Dei request would suffice.

I disagree. Senate committees have long been known to make in-depth studies, to go over the minute details of legislative measures with a fine-tooth comb. Allow me to use an example—extreme though it may be—to explain my thoughts. Let us imagine that Evangelist Swaggart or Bakker or, worse still, a successor of Reverend Jones—yes, he who was held responsible for the horrible Jonestown massacre in Guyana—had appeared before us and made the kind of request we have from Opus Dei. Would our reaction have been the same? Would we have said: It is a well-known church. At least one United States President, pious Jimmy Carter, publicly endorsed. It claims to be working to save souls, so we do not want to know anything more? After all, since Confederation we did grant the privilege of special legislation in 20 other like cases without asking too many questions. So a precedent does exist and it would be bad manners on our part to act more scrupulously towards a church, founded though it might be by a Swaggart, a Bakker or a Jones, on the pretence that its past is, to put it mildly, worrisome.

Honourable senators, I am sure you will agree with me that we would not have invoked precedents to limit ourselves exclusively to the legal aspect of the matter. Rightfully, we would have scrutinized every little detail with a magnifying glass, undoubtedly as we ought to have done in the 20 cases we refer to as precedents.

[English]

Why should the Canadian Senate give a certificate of approval, indirect as it may be, to the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, an organization which is controversial both inside and outside the Roman Catholic Church?

Senator Le Moyne, Senator Corbin, Senator Gigantès and I and others have pointed out the troubling aspects of Opus Dei: the questionable preachings of its founder; its close association with the Franco government and with other fascist regimes like the Pinochet regime in Chile; the many controversies concerning its involvement in financial and political circles; its dubious recruitment practices and troubling rumours of flagellations and mortification. We felt it was necessary to be critical of Opus Dei and to make known certain aspects of the group asking for the passage of a private bill. As Senator Le Moyne stated in his speech on June 2, 1987, referring to our century:

We can speak here without undue exaggeration of a real mutation of human understanding, and conclude that as the essence of modernity, criticism constitutes the very legitimacy of the age. Thus is guaranteed the freedom we are now exercising.

If Opus Dei can exist in Canada because of the religious freedom we all value, we also have the right to criticize this organization and to put forward facts about it which might otherwise be overlooked. We all hate to be criticized, but we have to accept that at least some criticism may have validity. Opus Dei, however, deems any criticism of its work and history unacceptable and worthy only of violent denials. It dismisses our criticisms of Opus Dei as calumnies and our presentations as dishonest fabrications. Statements of fact concerning the questionable maxims of its founder, its close ties with Franco's fascist regime, the extent of its holdings, its unequivocal position within the right wing of the church and the opposition of most bishops, priests and parishioners to its methods and its arrogance are responded to in the same way as allegations concerning its approval of mortification, its involvement in financial and political scandals and its undue influence within the church. Opus Dei treats almost everything said against it as lies or manipulation of facts. As the Vatican Affairs writer for the National Catholic Reporter says in the February 6, 1988, edition of the Tablet, Opus Dei "denies that it is a 'movement' and, indeed, denies almost anything that is said about it".

Another Opus Dei tactic is to downplay the importance of statements concerning its activities. It will say: yes, we are in the conservative wing of the church, but we are not much involved in the debate over liberation theology and the church's dogma; yes, there are maxims calling for mortification, but today it is left up to the individual to decide; yes, we were around when Franco and other dictators were in power, but we had nothing to do with them; and, yes, we are represented throughout the world and have members in key positions, but we do not have much influence. Even if it admitted that there were excesses in the past, Opus Dei would be likely to say that it is unfair to judge it today by its past record.

But has Opus Dei really changed over the years? The answer is no. In Spain, for example, Opus Dei, while denying its involvement, is still, just as during Franco's regime, associated with the suppression of journalists and academics who do not favour its policies. Only this past November the Jesuit Father Pedro Miguel Lamet, the editor of Vida Nueva—the most widely read religious journal in Spain, with a circulation of 20,000—was dismissed from his position. The January 9, 1988, issue of the Tablet attributes the dismissal to pressure from right wing circles in the church, including, notably, Opus Dei. Other journalists have resigned from the paper to protest the dismissal of Father Lamet, who, in his valedictory article in Vida Nueva, talks of a growing atmosphere of silence and fear in the church.

Some might dismiss this as an isolated case, but those who are aware of the debate within the church on liberation theology, the resurgence of revisionist influence and the role of movements and ministries know that there is a malaise within the church which is not yet grabbing all the headlines but which, nonetheless, exists. Why should the Canadian Senate take sides in this debate by agreeing without question to what Opus Dei wants? The fierce debate on the laity at last fall's synod of bishops illustrates the concerns of many within the church on the role of lay movements, such as Opus Dei. Some honourable senators have said that no attention should be paid to the religious and theological issues when considering the bill. Is this a realistic approach, in view of the participation of the organization making the request in a debate permeated by religious issues? Furthermore, can we, in all conscience, ignore the fact that the positions taken by Opus Dei in this debate cause great unease among many Catholics and non-Catholics alike? Honourable senators, in this respect, I will deal with two issues: Opus Dei's views on the role of women and the group's arrogance.

In his speech of June 2, 1987, Senator Le Moine pointed out the sexist attitude of Opus Dei and, as he called it, the "quagmire of clichés on the role of women in contemporary society" contained in the statements of Escrivà de Balaguer, the founder of the organization. Indeed, the Canadian Senate should have nothing to do with a group that holds views which many women find offensive. During last fall's synod on the laity, according to the issue of the Tablet of February 6, 1988, the report of one of the Spanish-language groups, of which Monseigneur Alvarez Portillo, Prelate of Opus Dei, was a member, dismissed the feminist movement as being "highly ambiguous" and "alleged, without offering any evidence, that it was 'an ideological deformation of the truth' ". Lest anyone think this is a general feeling within the church, I should point out that the report of another Spanish-language group "boldly denounced the 'cultural machismo that exists in Catholic countries' because it 'is lacking in respect towards women' ". The cavalier attitude of Opus Dei members towards the debate on the role of women within the church and within society as a whole comes across clearly in an article by Russell Shaw, a member of Opus Dei in the United States, in the February 27, 1988, issue of the Tablet, entitled "Judged by Opus Dei". Mr. Shaw states, on page 235:

that is, Opus Dei's,

[Senator Hébert.]

—insistence on maintaining separate activities for the spiritual formation of men and women is anathema to Catholic feminists who suppose that virtually any acknowledgement of differences between the sexes means treating women as something less than equal. Yet, serious as it is in the minds of those whom it exercises, this is in fact a comparatively superficial matter.

Thus, those who dare question the Opus Dei's attitude towards the participation of women in its work are branded as feminists and their concerns are dismissed out of hand. One has to wonder if the questions of equal pay for equal work, battered wives and the role of women in developing countries are also treated as "comparatively superficial matters." Does the Senate want to have its name linked to a group that holds such views?

The resentment shown by Opus Dei members when responding to criticism is typical of a group that has often displayed its holier-than-thou attitude. Senator Le Moine quoted note 399 of Opus Dei's founder, from his famous book The Way, which indicates the attitude of Opus Dei:

399. If we resort to force to prevent a man from committing suicide, thus saving a life and earning general plaudits, why should we hesitate to use the same coercion—holy coercion to save the Life—

with a capital L,

—of those who are bent on stupidly killing their own soul?

In other words, only Opus Dei members know what is right, and other people should imitate them instead of blindly going about their lives in the way they, themselves, see fit. Has time tempered the zeal of Opus Dei members and made them more tolerant of the views of others? No, not really. In an editorial in Le Devoir of May 11, 1987, it is stated:

[Translation]

It was not to seize power in Spain nor to exert some influence on worldly affairs that Mgr Escrivà de Balaguer founded Opus Dei, but to save the society of his time—

All of us!

—from its mistakes and its misfortunes, by leading "the way" to a new crusade, that of secular technocrats vowing to live an ideal of perfection for them and for their circle. A modern chivalry of the professional duty.

[English]

Whose ideal of perfection are we talking about? Opus Dei's ideal of perfection? This arrogance is also evident in Mr. Russell Shaw's article in the Tablet, where he states, on page 236:

Ideally, Opus Dei contains the seeds that might eventually ameliorate the current excesses in American Catholicism and thereby eliminate conflicts among Catholics.

In other words, when all Catholics think like the members of Opus Dei, there will be no more conflicts within the church in the United States and, eventually, the world. If this is an indication of the level of tolerance within Opus Dei towards people with different views within the Roman Catholic Church, one can only imagine how people outside the church are regarded. Does the Senate really want to encourage a group that has such a negative attitude towards Catholics who disagree with it and that is not likely to have a more tolerant attitude towards non-Catholics?

Indeed, in the preamble of the bill before us one of the objects of Opus Dei is stated as being:

... to promote and encourage, among members of society in general, the pursuit of personal sanctification by means of ordinary work;

In clause 3 of the bill, paragraphs (b) and (c) read as follows:

(b) to promote and encourage, among persons in all walks of life, the pursuit of personal sanctification by means of ordinary work; and

(c) to prepare and encourage persons in all sectors of society to give effective Christian witness in their daily activities.

Thus, it is not just the members of Opus Dei who will be affected by the incorporation of the Regional Vicar, but all Canadians, and especially the adolescents who may, at one time or another, be encouraged to participate in activities sanctioned by Opus Dei or see their lives influenced by its activities. Canadian society as a whole will be affected by the passage of this private bill.

• (1540)

May I remind honourable senators of our responsibilities in such matters by quoting from the book by F.A. Kunz, The Modern Senate of Canada, 1925-1963. A Reappraisal. On page 210, he says:

In addition to being a jury hearing petitioners and adverse parties the Senate in considering private bills shows great precaution in protecting the interests of the public at large. In so doing it does not hesitate to amend or even to reject private bill petitions.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was told that private bills are not by their nature designed to serve a public interest. Since nothing in the bill is prohibited by an act of Parliament, the bill itself, as an instrument of incorporation, cannot be said to be contrary to the public interest. However, it is still up to the Senate to decide whether it is in the interest of the public at large for the Canadian Senate to be involved in the incorporation of a group that is highly controversial within the Roman Catholic Church and that has demonstrated attitudes and methods that often hurt the free and tolerant society Canadians cherish.

Because of the religious freedom in our country, it is argued that we should not pay attention to the religious aspects of the issue, but simply pass the bill as we would any other request for incorporation. Because similar bills have been approved in the past with little discussion on their merits, there is a body of opinion that holds that this bill should be no exception. However, such an attitude leaves the door open to abuse; the Senate should be very careful in its approach to bills of this nature.

A controversial religious group is petitioning the Senate for a favour; yet an examination of the group's aims and methods is not deemed necessary simply because it is a religious group. The question we should be addressing is whether or not it is in the interest of the Canadian public for the Senate to become involved at all with this group.

The point is made that, since Opus Dei was granted the status of a personal prelature by the Pope in 1982, the group's only recourse is to become a corporation sole, which, in view of existing laws, can only be established by a private bill in the Senate. But we seem to be forgetting that it was Opus Dei itself that, in the 1960s, lobbied the leaders of the church to obtain the status of personal prelature. It is only because of that change in its status that the Canadian Senate must now try to accommodate Opus Dei. Why must the Canadian Senate be so generous to a group that has little tolerance for some elements of its own church, that has a legacy of involvement in political and financial circles that favour one group rather than society as a whole, and that, despite its denials, still covers many of its activities with a screen of secrecy?

There is another passage in Kunz's work on the Senate of which we should take note. On the subject of private bills, he states, on page 209:

The provisions governing publication and filing of petitions as well as the notification of any person who might be affected serve the purpose of enabling all concerned to have every opportunity to present themselves before the Senate and dispute, if necessary, the bill's passage.

By limiting our discussions in committee to the legal aspects of the bill and by refusing to hear all persons who wanted to speak on all its aspects, have we not failed to give every opportunity for people to make their views known? Opus Dei has been active in Canada for 30 years and, despite its change in status in 1982, it has continued its work without a federal charter. It can operate for another year or more without one. The Canadian Senate does not have to rush to pass this private bill and, indeed, should pay attention to all aspects of the issue, something it has the right and duty to do.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we are all proud to live in a democratic nation where the individual's freedoms are now based on a Charter of Rights, a nation where each one is free to establish the most bizarre organizations and to propagate the most peculiar cults, including those that may have a negative impact on our society by poisoning the minds of our youngest citizens.

To me and to a number of my most distinguished colleagues, Opus Dei is a kind of bizarre and dangerous cult with a totalitarian streak that teaches blind obedience rather than freedom.

In spite of everything, in the name of freedom itself, I would be ready to fight for Opus Dei having the right to propagate its utter nonsense. However, by opposing Bill S-7 we are in no way limiting Opus Dei's freedom. I had a proof of that in committee, in the evidence brought by its regional vicar himself, Reverend Haddock. Let me quote briefly from the exchange I had with Opus Dei's leader in Canada on February 27, 1988:

SENATOR HÉBERT: How long has Opus Dei been in existence in Canada?

THE RIGHT REVEREND HADDOCK: Thirty years.

By the way, I wonder why in the committee's minutes, a mere Reverend is called Right Reverend. I am only quoting from the official record.

SENATOR HÉBERT: And there were no problems or difficulties of any kind?

—for Opus Dei, I asked him.

RIGHT REVEREND HADDOCK: Not to my knowledge.

SENATOR HÉBERT: Opus Dei reached its goals over these last thirty years . . .

RIGHT REVEREND HADDOCK: Exactly.

SENATOR HÉBERT: Opus Dei may own property in Quebec and in Ontario and elsewhere through non-profit organizations under various names, which organizations are vaguely implying that Opus Dei is responsible for the spiritual aspect of their activity. Opus Dei has always acted in that way without difficulty, hasn't it?

RIGHT REVEREND HADDOCK: That is not quite accurate.

At that point, counsel for the reverend stepped in, which allowed us to learn that Opus Dei itself does not own property but its real estate is owned by provincial corporations or loaned by members. In fact, there is talk of multi-million dollar buildings in the plush districts of Montreal and elsewhere.

Here is the continuation of the testimony:

SENATOR HÉBERT: Opus Dei has been using those buildings as it pleases for 30 years and is still prospering, right?

THE RIGHT REVEREND HADDOCK: Yes.

SENATOR HÉBERT: If Opus Dei is expanding, if it does much on the spiritual, material and other levels, and if it teaches vigorously the theories of its beloved founder, why do you want more? If everything has been fine for 30 years, what more do you want? Opus Dei has been doing as it pleases for 30 years in Canada. Why bother the Senate with a special bill? I don't understand what you want.

The answers were very vague, Opus Dei's style. Father Haddock even gave us this outrageous answer to my question: Since members of Opus Dei might die, he had to have the possibility of buying a plot in the cemetery to bury them. Can you imagine that? What a childish argument, coming from the head of an organisation which, through a kind of front, the Fondation pour la culture et l'éducation, owns expensive properties, avenue du Musée in Montreal, right in the centre of the prestigious Square Mile, rue Louis-Colin, rue Plantagenet, avenue des Pins, Redpath Crescent, not to mention the Manoir de Beaujeu, an heritage building. It is really taking the Senate for a ride to say that, without S-7, Opus Dei could not buy a plot in a cemetery.

Father Haddock's counsel came to his rescue and mentioned another so-called legal reason. We have seen that, since 1960, Opus Dei has been pressuring the Vatican to get a change of the Canon law which would allow it to become a personal prelature, whatever that means, and that prompted the request to the Senate. But Canon law governs the Roman Catholic Church, not Canada. It is up to Opus Dei to adapt to Canadian law and not up to Canada to legislate according to Canon law.

But, besides being shaky the argument is also specious. If, as clearly stated by Father Haddock in front of the committee, Opus Dei has been active in Canada for 30 years without problems and without a special statute, why did it ask for one with such insistence in 1987 and 1988, when the change in Canon law which is supposed to justify its request dates back to 1982? What have they been doing during all that time?

None of that makes sense and we have to look elsewhere for the real reasons of the intense lobbying to which many senators were subjected. I will spare you the darkest hypotheses mentioned by opponents of Opus Dei inside and outside the Catholic Church, and I will concentrate on the most benign, at least in appearance.

Because it feels strongly opposed, Opus Dei wants the Senate and eventually Parliament to give it some kind of endorsement, some nil obstat that it would use in its propaganda in Canada and abroad. The Senate is not some kind of Better Business Bureau and it should not deliver some kind of certificate of approval, especially since, in committee at least, we refused to discuss the background, the doctrine and the objectives of Opus Dei.

As I said, the committee was satisfied with considering the legal aspect of the application and raising the principle of precedents, a dangerous principle which seems to exert a great fascination over legislators and justify all sorts of compromise.

The supporters of Opus Dei, an organization which Senator Le Moyne described once as "a pious eel, unctuous, smooth, slippery and illusive", had no intention of discussing its tenebrous past, its dangerous habit of indoctrinating impressionable minds, its deplorable doctrine which Senator Le Moyne had literally destroyed in a memorable speech.

● (1550)

The Opus Dei and its counsels have been quick to realize that their one and only salvation was the sacrosanct principle of precedents which seemed to reassure a number of committee members, completely overwhelmed by the pressures they were subjected to and who wanted to get it over with as soon as possible.

Since, as a matter of fact, there are 20 precedents, the majority of committee members found that they had to approve the Opus Dei's application while moving an amendment to try and force this organization with a questionable past and a well-known penchant for secrecy to submit to the Department of National Revenue financial statements every year. That is the reason why this chamber must deal again today with a slightly amended version of Bill S-7.

But there was so much opposition within the committee to this bill that we unanimously moved a resolution to be conveyed to the government, as Senator Joan Neiman, the chairperson of the committee, explained on May 26 last:

However, I wish to advise honourable senators that there was complete unanimity in the committee that Parliament should no longer be required to act in the sort of statutory vacuum that appears to exist with respect to corporations sole. Whatever the decision of the Senate might be with respect to Bill S-7, the committee has instructed me to request the Senate to advise the government in the strongest possible terms to proceed as quickly as possible with new legislation respecting the incorporation of non-profit and religious organizations. Furthermore, in doing so, the government should consider very carefully whether there is any continuing justification for the type of corporation sole considered here. If the government decides there is still such a necessity, then it should set out in the new legislation all the necessary safeguards and limits upon its use.

But we had hardly made a decision on exclusively legal grounds when some committee members started to ask some fundamental questions. The most serious is as follows: Had we voted in favour of the amended bill because of the precedents or had we instead created a new precedent, something really none of us wanted to do?

The 20 precedents, extending from 1867 to this day, concerned applications submitted by bishops from various churches which are called different names like "éparques" for the Slovak Church of Byzantine rite. Anyway, the 20 precedents dealt with bishops and churches.

In this case, what are we dealing with exactly? First of all, Father Haddock is not a bishop and does not claim to be. While to this day we had only granted the privilege of simple incorporation, or "corporation sole", to bishops alone, why all of a sudden create a new precedent by granting it to a simple priest?

On the other hand, the 20 cases mentioned involved bishops from Catholic, Protestant and other churches. But is Opus Dei a church? Not at all. In Bill S-7, the petitioner himself describes it as a "secular jurisdictional institution". Such an institution, even if recognized by the Church, cannot be considered a church. However, at the very moment when the committee recommends strongly that the government table an omnibus bill to put an end to this unseemly kind of private bill, at the very moment when our committee states clearly that it is with great reticence that it finally resigned itself, after having hesitated during 14 months, to give Opus Dei the special status which it seeks, the Senate is asked to set two precedents. We announce that, despite the precedents, we no longer wish to grant through private bills the status of corporation sole, even to bishops representing churches. And yet we would grant this privilege to a priest representing a secular institution.

For my part, I think that the committee unwittingly contradicted itself. While invoking in good faith the principle of precedents, they subsequently found out that they were setting two more. But, thank God, it is not too late to get out of this preposterous situation. The Senate could simply return Bill S-7 to committee for further study. Opus Dei, which has exercised its harmful activity in Canada for 30 years through provincial charters, can wait a bit more: after all, eternity is on its side.

A simpler and, indeed, more courageous solution would be for the Senate to refuse categorically to set two precedents and strengthen the vigorous request it has just sent to the government by rejecting Bill S-7 outright. It would earn the admiration and the gratitude of all men and women who value freedom, whether they be Catholic or not, whether they be from the left or the right, whatever their political stripe.

May God grant us this grace. Amen!

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifty-third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senators' Travel Policy), presented on Thursday, June 2, 1988.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (drought conditions in Western Canada), presented in the Senate on 31st May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Olson).

• (1600)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments on this report of the Agriculture Committee. When it was introduced last week, I expressed my disappointment that the meeting of the federal minister with provincial Ministers of Agriculture in Calgary last Tuesday did not conclude with a decision to initiate some relief measures for the farmers and ranchers who are suffering as a result of the tremendous drought. I did indicate that I might take a few days to go over much of the drought area to see whether or not there had been any relief in the form of precipitation. I have done that since last Thursday, and I can report to the Senate that there has been no significant relief from the drought. There was a significant change in the weather pattern in that a very large mass of warm moist air moved into the prairie regions of western Canada and across much of the drought area. I spent several days and, indeed, this morning phoning various places to learn about the rainfall. Indeed, there were some showers, but the amount of relief was small. The rainfall ranged from two-tenths of an inch to half an inch. There was also some violent weather which spawned some tornadoes in central Alberta and some areas close to that violent weather may have received a little more precipitation than I have just indicated. However, generally there has been no significant relief in terms of getting enough moisture to get the grass growing or, indeed, to relieve the situation with respect to crops.

On further checking I learned that the market has not deteriorated as rapidly as some people had expected. That at least is a bright spot for those farmers who have come to the end of their supplies of feed or hay from last year or previous years. So, if some farmers are forced to put their cattle on the market, at least they will find that the price has not deteriorated significantly. It should be pointed out, however, that selling brood cows and small calves in the market at this time of year is highly unusual. Normally this is the time of year when the most profitable gains can be made through grazing cattle on green grass. At least things are different this time as compared to the disaster of the 1930s. Then the farmers who had to sell out, because they did not have grass or feed, hardly got anything for their animals when they went to market.

I hope that the government will recognize that the crisis has arrived for thousands of cattle producers. The crisis is not going to arrive next week, in two weeks or in three weeks' time. Many people have had to make management decisions to get rid of their livestock, because they simply do not have any grass or any more feed for them.

I also want to say that I suppose there is some comfort in hearing Ministers of Agriculture, such as the federal minister, the minister for Saskatchewan and, indeed, Premier Devine, saying that, if at any time there is an announcement of assistance by governments, it will be retroactive and therefore farmers do not need to worry. The worry is that farmers do not know what will be retroactive. For example, no assistance program for the transportation of hay or water has been announced by the federal government at all. I would like to make it clear that the $12 million that was added last Tuesday to the $7.5 million committed in the budget is only useful in the long-term preparations for water supply. It is not an emergency relief measure and no part of that contribution deals with emergency relief for hauling water or transporting water by permanent or temporary pipeline or whatever. So, insofar as emergency relief measures are concerned, that announcement did not add anything to the assistance for people who need it and need it now.

Honourable senators, I conclude by saying that, in my view, the point where it would have been appropriate for the government to make an announcement with regard to emergency relief is some time behind us. It should have been made a couple of weeks ago, because it would have stabilized the price of hay. However, the Ministers of Agriculture, for reasons that I do not understand, have continued to say up to now that the crisis has not yet arrived. They have admitted that there will be a crisis if the drought continues, but they steadfastly maintain that it will be some time in the future. I hope they will change their minds soon and announce a program so that we can keep some of these farmers and ranchers in business, rather than facing this drought situation without any assistance, so that they will be successful and viable livestock producers in the future.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Fairbairn, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE INSTRUCTED TO DIVIDE BILL C-103 INTO TWO BILLS

On the Order:

Motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman:

That it be an instruction of this House to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that it divide Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, into two Bills, in order that it may deal separately with Part I, entitled the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and Part II, entitled Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I believe that Senator Graham has something to say on the substance of the motion, if there is any.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The substance is so clear that he needn't say anything!

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I thank honourable senators for their indulgence in dealing with this particular motion. When I spoke in this chamber on May 26 on Bill C-103, I closed my remarks with a quotation from an editorial carried in the Cape Breton Post on May 12 of this year and I believe that the quotation bears repeating: "Why change DEVCO now? It's a good question and the government hasn't answered it."

Let us look first at the title of Bill C-103, an act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other acts. In the government's plan, the evisceration of the Cape Breton Development Corporation is billed as "consequential and related amendments to other Acts". The Cape Breton Development Corporation is not even mentioned in the title. That is an unfortunate commentary on a great institution which, for 20 years, has been the heart and soul of the Cape Breton economy.

Cape Bretoners have every right to question the government's reasons for separating the Coal and Industrial Development Divisions of Devco since the benefits of this move are not self-evident. Clearly, the government has not made a convincing argument in favour of the reorganization.

I want to recognize that Bill C-103 does have some redeeming features. One can hardly argue with any proposed decentralization of decision-making power to the region. If this actually transpires, the increased likelihood of greater sensitivity to local concerns will be the most positive feature of ACOA. This is not to suggest that initiatives of ACOA should proceed without due regard for the directions of national policy. It is no coincidence that the regional economy least integrated with the national economy, that of Atlantic Canada, is also the least developed.

Honourable senators might recognize that the range of development options provided to ACOA is reminiscent of the original Devco legislation. That framework for government action, initiated in 1967, has proved so successful that ACOA has been given the same tools to attack disparities throughout the entire region. That is a sensible approach. What escapes me and what escapes civic leaders and others throughout Cape Breton is the logic that states that the investiture of ACOA with flexible tools of regional development must result in the divestiture of Devco with respect to its ability positively to influence growth and expansion in the Cape Breton economy. One might well ask, "Why are the tools being given to ACOA and taken away from Devco?"

When speaking at second reading, I identified several shortcomings in the ACOA legislation. While holding those concerns, I recognize the positive aspects of Part I and I look forward to further discussions on Part I in committee. That having been said, Part II and clauses 46 to 50, which deal with Devco in Part III, warrant even more careful consideration.

I spoke of the historic link between the two divisions of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In closing the debate on second reading, Senator Murray quoted at length from the writing of Professor Roy George of Dalhousie University with respect to the working relationship between the Coal and the Industrial Development Divisions of Devco. Having been present at the birth of Devco and during the first four years of its existence, I know Professor George's analysis to be wrong. I would also point out that this analysis is at total variance with the testimony given to the travelling legislative committee at Port Hawkesbury by the chairman of Devco and the vice-president of the Industrial Development Division.

● (1610)

I also spoke of the social contract forged between the community and Devco through the work of the Industrial Development Division. I quoted the chairman of Devco, Dr. Teresa MacNeil, who stated:

The social conscience of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has long been made possible by the work it assigned to the Industrial Development Division.

Honourable senators, if ever a government agency won the hearts and the minds of those citizens it was established to serve, that agency is Devco.

I referred as well to letters addressed to federal ministers de Cotret and Murray from the Cape Breton Industrial Area Community Futures Committee. In a letter dated November 23, 1987, the committee stated, in part, and I quote:

On the basis of the feedback we are receiving from the organizations within the community, it is clear that the Industrial Development Division is perceived as a key component in the development of Cape Breton. While new programs such as Enterprise Cape Breton and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency are welcomed, the Cape Breton community rightfully distinguishes between these initiatives and the status of the Industrial Development Division. The community understands that DEVCO was created by a special act of Parliament; other development programs while significant are, nonetheless, programs.

That letter was written on behalf of a broad cross-section of citizens from all walks of life and all political persuasions. The letter, it is interesting to note, was written prior to the introduction of the ACOA legislation in the other place on December 18, 1987. Yet correspondence from these groups in the interim clearly indicates that their concerns have not been alleviated by the provisions of Bill C-103.

I do not want to take up honourable senators' time by reiterating what is already on the record. I dealt extensively with what I thought were shortcomings in the legislation when I spoke on second reading. I would, however, like to spend a few moments on some additional components of the bill which I believe warrant further and more careful scrutiny.

First of all, Bill C-103 does not speak directly to the transfer of employees from the Industrial Development Division to the new corporation. We might assume that these Devco employees may simply be transferred to Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation; however, the bill is sufficiently vague on this topic that employees of the Industrial Development Division may well be apprehensive about their future.

Second, the bill creates an unusual corporate hierarchy for the new corporation. The legislation provides for a president, a vice-president and a board of directors, yet it does not create a position of chairman of the board. As well, the bill does not provide for an on-site president at the headquarters in Sydney.

Finally, the bill does not stipulate how the assets and the liabilities of Devco will be divided between the two corporations. Clause 44(5) of the bill partly addresses this issue by stating:

For greater certainty, the administration and control of all property that, on the coming into force of this section, is held by or leased to the Cape Breton Development Corporation for the use or benefit of the continued corporation are transferred to the new corporation.

This, in my judgment, is not clear enough. I am concerned that the non-coal assets of the Industrial Development Division will go to the new corporation, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, while the liabilities of this division remain with Devco. The legislation should be explicit as to the transfer of both the assets and the liabilities to the new corporation.

As I noted in my earlier speech, honourable senators, this legislation is fundamentally flawed by references to Enterprise Cape Breton as a continued corporation, which, in my opinion, it clearly is not.

I moved the motion to divide Bill C-103 because, in my opinion, the government has not paid adequate attention to the future structure, the mandate and the direction of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. What does the future hold for the Coal Division? I have spoken of the possibility of privatization. Surely it is incumbent upon the government to deal with Devco in a comprehensive sense, and yet the government has not indicated a willingness, let alone made a commitment, to further revise the Devco legislation so that the Coal Division may become a fully functioning coal company.

I believe that Devco has proved its worth as an instrument of regional development and should have been strengthened by the addition of Enterprise Cape Breton's financial resources and programs. In that context, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation would be superfluous, but the government chose to destroy the essence of Devco while giving few thoughts to the continued viability of the Coal Division. That omission is totally unacceptable to me.

The ramifications of this decision require further study. At the same time, our concerns with Part I of the bill are not as profound as those related to Part II and, indeed, clauses 46 to 50 of Part III. Part I is not dependent upon Part II. The integrity of the legislation dealing with ACOA is unaffected. That is why, honourable senators, for a better, a fairer, a more efficient approach in examining Bill C-103, I moved that the bill in question be divided so that the sections dealing with ACOA and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation might be dealt with separately.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Could I ask Senator Graham to refresh my memory and tell us the number of employees in Devco who are concerned only with the Coal Division and the number of employees employed by the Industrial Development Division?

Senator Graham: I do not have the exact figures in front of me, honourable senators, but I would estimate that the Coal Division employs approximately 4,300 to 4,500 people. I do not have the exact number for the Industrial Development Division, but, including the subsidiaries, I would estimate it employs 30 to 50 people. Perhaps Senator Murray is in a better position to respond to that than I am.

Senator MacDonald: Did Senator Graham say "30 to 50 people"?

[Senator Graham.]

Senator Graham: That is my estimate at the present time. As honourable senators are aware, the Industrial Development Division has some subsidiaries. I am not aware of the present employment figures in the entire division plus the subsidiaries, but I would be happy to obtain that information and pass it on to Senator MacDonald.

Senator MacDonald: Is a "subsidiary" a company that has been assisted, or is a "subsidiary" something that is wholly owned? Can Senator Graham give us an example of a subsidiary of the Industrial Development Division?

Senator Graham: There is DARR Cape Breton Ltd., the industrial park, the golf course, amongst other entities, which are owned and operated on behalf of the Industrial Development Division of the corporation.

Senator MacDonald: Does Senator Graham have any idea of the activity of the Industrial Development Division of Devco as opposed to the activity of Enterprise Cape Breton since Enterprise Cape Breton began some short time ago?

Senator Graham: Yes, I do. My contention has been, and has been for quite some time, that Enterprise Cape Breton has served a purpose to a limited degree, but that the Industrial Development Division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation could have served that purpose and, indeed, could serve that purpose today.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to Senator Graham as he discussed the motion to split this bill. What he really discussed were the arguments that he wished to put forward against continuing the Industrial Development Division of Devco under a new rubric, under a new organization to be called "Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation". He did not enlighten us at all as to what the process is going to be with regard to splitting this bill, if this motion is accepted by the Senate. What will happen? I am appearing tomorrow night before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to discuss Bill C-103. If this motion passes, the committee will be under instructions to split that bill. What happens then? We will then have not one but two bills. Are they government bills? Are they Senate bills? What are they? What message will be sent to the House of Commons from the Senate when the committee, acting on instructions from the Senate, reports to this place? What about the problem of the royal recommendation and so forth?

● (1620)

The fact that the honourable senator has ignored these questions entirely in his presentation only indicates to me the soundness of the ruling on this matter that was made earlier today by the Speaker. It indicates to me—and I say this not in a pejorative way—that the decision to overrule the Speaker was somewhat irresponsible. I do not know where this motion is going to take us, if it passes.

Honourable senators, it seems fairly clear to me that Bill C-103—this government measure that has come to us from the House of Commons—will, in effect, be killed. Obviously, quite apart from the procedural difficulties—even perhaps constitutional difficulties—that will arise, I am opposed and the government will be opposed to splitting this bill. The bill was intended to draw together in one place all of the authority focusing on small and medium-sized business development in the Atlantic region. The Industrial Development Division of Devco had a mandate to deal with those issues. Therefore, the government regards it as essential that that division become part of the economic development family, as it were, that it become part of the ACOA family. That is the reason for Part II of the bill. It is an essential part of the bill.

It seems to me, and it is obvious from what Senator Graham has said, that he is opposed to the substance of Part II, and that what is being attempted here is to stall, or perhaps to block, passage of Part II.

The honourable senator has put forward today and previously various arguments against the continuation of the Industrial Development Division of Devco in its new form as the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. He indicated that the twinning of the industrial development activity with the coal mining operation had produced some advantages to Cape Breton that could not be realized if the Coal and the Industrial Development Divisions were separated. I will not say that these advantages exist in the honourable senator's imagination, but I do say that they are certainly theoretical. Nobody that I have heard has been able to provide the solid evidence that this twinning will really produce anything that could not have been produced had the two operations remained separate. Indeed, there is a lot of evidence, to which I pointed in a speech the other day, to show that these two divisions led separate lives. In any case, I also referred the other day to the report of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee, appointed by the present government a couple of years ago, which report recommended a one-stop-shopping industrial development agency separate from the coal operation.

The other argument that the honourable senator used previously and again today is that leaving the coal operation on its own will somehow make it more vulnerable—more vulnerable, in particular, he thought, to privatization. Honourable senators, if it needs saying, I will certainly say it on behalf of the government: Devco is not a candidate for privatization. The coal operation of Devco is not a candidate for privatization. However, even if some future government some years from now decided that it was a candidate for privatization and could find a buyer, it would be no easier to effect that under the proposed legislation than it is under the present legislation. It would still take an act of Parliament to do the deed. In any case, I repeat that the Coal Division and Devco are not candidates for privatization.

The honourable senator has talked about what the Industrial Development Division has done in Cape Breton. He has spoken of the confidence placed in the IDD by its clientele, and so forth; he has spoken of its sense of social responsibility. Again, I ask the question: Why should the sense of social responsibility be any less under the ECBC than it was under the IDD? What has it been doing in its personality or identity as the Industrial Development Division of Devco that it would be impossible to do as the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation? As I have indicated, the IDD is coming into the economic development family, into the ACOA family, intact. I invite honourable senators to read the bill in this respect. In addition, I will be glad to provide all of the assurances that one can reasonably expect a minister to provide in this situation as far as the employees of the IDD are concerned. When I appear before the committee, I will deal with some of the other specific concerns raised by the honourable senator with regard to the transfer of the assets and liabilities of the one organization to the other.

Honourable senators, I will argue that there are advantages to Cape Breton that will be made possible by the new arrangement. First—and this is the intent—there will be better coordination of federal economic and industrial development activities in Cape Breton. Second, I believe that it will be much more possible to reduce duplication and overlap. Third, we will be providing one-stop shopping in Cape Breton with respect to economic and industrial development, as was recommended by the Cape Breton Advisory Committee and by others who have studied the situation there. How are we doing this? We are bringing the IDD in its new form, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, into the economic development family rather than leaving it twinned to the coal mining operation.

Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and ACOA will be the responsibility of the same minister. They will have a common president, but, of course, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will have its own chief operating officer resident in Cape Breton. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, its board and its management will be in a position, I believe, to exert a stronger influence on federal government policies and programs under the new order than has been the case in the past.

Having said all that, honourable senators, I acknowledge readily that there is room for a difference of opinion on this matter. I think it has been demonstrated in the debates that there is room for difference of opinion among people who sincerely want the best for Cape Breton. Will the new organizational setup be an improvement? I believe it will. I believe it will be a considerable improvement. Other honourable senators think not. This is a difference of opinion, but I suggest that it does not call for the vehemence that we have heard, not so much from Senator Graham as from others in the public discussion of this matter. It is not a matter that should call forth some theological or ideological positions.

In terms of the effect of this change on Cape Breton, this is not a radical departure. Some of the lessons that we have learned in Cape Breton from the Industrial Development Division of Devco and from Enterprise Cape Breton, which has been quite an outstanding success, as I indicated the other day, are being applied in the region generally through the ACOA mandate. I regard this—as the government regards this—as an important but evolutionary step. It is progress. While I respect the fact that it is being done against what some honourable senators and others would regard as their better judgment, I ask honourable senators and others to accept it and to have some confidence in the objects that we have stated in bringing forward these changes, to work with it and to help make it work.

I will stop there in the hope and expectation that we will have an opportunity to discuss these matters at greater length in the committee.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am brought to my feet mainly to follow very briefly upon the vein of thought opened by Senator Murray when he expressed the view that the Senate had made a mistake and had acted irresponsibly in overruling the Speaker's judgment, a ruling which, in his view, he thought was soundly based. May I add that I found the ruling unsoundly based, without any support even in logic. Certainly it will require considerable evidence to convince me that these bills, if they are divided, have originated and have seen the light of day in the Senate. It will require somebody to show me where a dollar of the public revenue is appropriated by this present bill. It does not appropriate any funds, because the funds that are being spent under ACOA and Enterprise Cape Breton Development Corporation have been appropriated not through this bill but through the Estimates.

That is why we found the ruling unsoundly based. It is fair that I should give our side of the story, though I regret saying that, because, if a ruling is overruled, it is not customary to debate it subsequently.

Let us not read too much into what is happening with regard to the procedure. The Senate may instruct the committee to divide the bill into two parts: one part dealing with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the other part dealing with Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. Bill C-103 is easily divisible. One can look at it and reach that conclusion very quickly. There is nothing ominous in that process, because it is possible that these two bills will emerge from the committee identical in substance to the present bill. It passes my comprehension how Senator Murray can draw the conclusion that an instruction to divide the bill is to kill the bill. That is reaching for a crisis atmosphere that at present does not prevail.

Senator Murray: I should have read these clippings from the Halifax Herald for the record.

Senator MacEachen: I should not be diverted, but Senator Murray has referred to an alleged quotation in the Halifax newspaper. Those words have never yet been uttered by me, not yet.

Senator Flynn: Not yet.

Senator MacEachen: So please do not accuse me of an uncommitted act or word.

Senator Murray says, "What has happened?" Is it a government bill? Of course it remains a government bill. It would have been changed in form in the committee and put into two parts. If Part I, which is Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, were found acceptable, it could be reported and, likewise, the second part could be reported unamended or amended. I do not see great difficulties with that.

Honourable senators, may I explain why I thought the motion proposed by Senator Graham had merit and still does have merit? First, it has to do with timing. The government has expressed deep interest in having the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency put into legislative form. It affects all four provinces of Atlantic Canada.

As Senator Graham has said, certainly those of us from Nova Scotia find greater difficulties and more questions to ask with respect to the Cape Breton policy than for the Atlantic policy as a whole. In order not to impede the progress of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, we thought it would be better to sever so that each could proceed at its own pace. That makes sense to me, and it could accommodate the minister considerably if, indeed, we want to spend more time on Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Let me say to the minister that I am eager to be convinced that the fears which I have are not based on solid ground. It is for that reason that I have been reading all the information I can get my hands on, and that is why I will be following the evidence in the committee very carefully.

● (1640)

If all the fears which I presently have in my mind with respect to the Cape Breton policy are removed by the evidence, then there will not even be an amendment proposed to the second bill.

Senator Flynn: There will be two bills.

Senator MacEachen: Of course there will be two bills, if this motion carries!

Senator Flynn: Can you change your mind?

Senator MacEachen: There will be two bills.

Senator Flynn: You are talking about two bills.

Senator MacEachen: I talked about the possible pace of treatment of the bills.

But there is a second point—and to me it is an important point: the Cape Breton Development Corporation was brought into being by a separate act of Parliament. The economy of Cape Breton was important enough to justify that Parliament dealt with it separately as a special, important subject. Here, again, we are going to the very roots of Cape Breton economic policy in this particular bill. It is my view that it should be dealt with separately and independently on its own merits. Cape Breton deserves that treatment. It received it when Devco was founded and it should receive it when Devco is to be reshaped.

I can put it more flamboyantly, if the minister wishes. If one had the view that the creation of Devco deserved a separate act of Parliament, one could also take the view that the execution of Devco deserves a separate act of Parliament. Those are the two basic reasons why I thought it might appeal to the minister to have these two important items dealt with separately, and why we should ask the procedures of Parliament to accommodate, in a sense, the human political reality.

I have views on the bill itself, but I will not debate them today with the minister. However, he made some points that interested me—particularly the virtue of having Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation integrated into the ACOA family. There are those in Cape Breton who think that that is not a virtue but a vice; that, if it is integrated into the ACOA family, which is to say, if it is integrated into a government department—and that is basically what ACOA is—it will then lose its community identification. Devco will become like a part of any other department and will lose the community identification that it has built up. It will lose its independence and its clout.

That is the contrary argument. We hope that in the committee we will be able to iron these matters out and find out exactly what is to happen. Those are the reasons why it is important that the Cape Breton portion of the bill be dealt with separately.

I mentioned that I was in Sydney, where Devco is headquartered, on Saturday. I found considerable interest in what is happening in the Parliament of Canada. I think that Senator Graham, in making this motion to divide the bill, was asking Parliament to decide the fate of Cape Breton on its merits, and not as part of an overall bill. So that when the judgment is reached, it will be reached clearly and starkly, and not be said, "Well, yes, that was done to Cape Breton, but how could we avoid it when we had to vote for the whole thing as a package?" To remove that—Senator Flynn: You voted at second reading on the two parts together!

Senator MacEachen: Quite. Senator Flynn has reiterated the obvious. It is true that we dealt with it. We had no choice, but now we have a choice. The dividing of the bill does not have ominous difficulties at all. It is breaking new ground, but it has no ominous difficulties for our procedures or our Constitution. It will give us an opportunity to deal with the two major sections separately, both with respect to timing and substance.

If the minister can convince us all that what he is doing, for example, with respect to Cape Breton, is an improvement, he will then have total support.

An Hon. Senator: In Part II.

Senator MacEachen: Absolutely!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: In a second bill!

Senator MacEachen: And why not in a second bill? Why not? Is there anything—

Senator Flynn: You cannot initiate a second bill.

Senator MacEachen: Senator Flynn is attempting to revive the procedural argument.

Senator Flynn: Well, yes—

Senator MacEachen: It has been settled, and now we are faced—

Senator Flynn: No; it has not.

Senator MacEachen:—with a vote that will have the effect, if carried, of dividing the bill. That will be the judgment of this house, and we must live with that. But let us not create difficulties that do not exist in dealing with this matter. That is all I say.

Therefore, I am saying to the minister that to say that this will effectively kill the bill is to create a crisis atmosphere that the circumstances do not justify. I would like him to cool the temperature until we see the results of the committee work. But no matter what the committee does, the Senate will have to deal with it once again.

Senator Flynn: I would like to deal for a moment with the problem of the committee and to indicate how, in my view, it is quite clear that this motion is intended to kill the bill.

Senator MacEachen has said that the committee will have no choice but to split the bill into two bills, and that it will have to report on two bills. Let us imagine, for example, that the first bill, Part I, comes back without any amendment. It is called Bill C-103 and is covered by the recommendation of the Governor in Council.

We have it here. We send it to the House of Commons, saying, "We have examined Bill C-103 and now we report it"—I guess we will have to say with amendments or without Part II. If we indicate that there is another bill coming, the House will then have to say, "Well, what was the matter? We sent a bill with two parts and only one is returned. Will another one be forthcoming?" In the view of the government, these two parts are tied. Therefore, if there is some procedural objection over there, and if it is indicated that the second bill is coming, the House will not be invited to consider only this part. In any event, this is just one problem.

Let us refer to the second bill now. What will it be called? Bill C-103(B) or Bill C-103(A)?

Senator MacEachen: Would that be difficult?

Senator Flynn: Or an "S-something" bill?

Senator MacEachen: Is that difficult?

Senator Flynn: It would be interesting if it would be entitled an "S-bill." It would not have the recommendation of the Governor in Council in any way; you would have used it on the first bill.

Senator MacEachen: Come on!

Senator Flynn: It is so obvious!

Senator MacEachen: Come on, Senator Flynn!

Senator Flynn: It is announced. You mentioned a word before referring to a motion that I made, calling it a "monstrosity." This is really a parliamentary monstrosity! It was devised by one man who knows better, and who knows where he is going. He is trying to kill the bill without taking the responsibility for doing so. The opposition has already voted unanimously for this bill on second reading.

● (1650)

Senator MacEachen: Don't create a crisis when none exists!

Senator Flynn: Am I creating a crisis?

Senator MacEachen: If you are begging for a crisis, we will accommodate you!

Senator Flynn: You have been preparing the ground work for this for a very long time! You have been exercising your ways and means, which, of course, are very typical and about which we have learned over the past four years or so. It is obvious.

Senator MacEachen: Come on!

Senator Flynn: Technically, we will be faced with an impossible solution to this matter. You have not even given the committee the occasion to redeem itself by instructing it to only consider dividing the bill. Once we have given the instruction to the committee, it has no choice. It has to bring back two bills, though we did not receive two bills from the House of Commons and we cannot return two bills to the House of Commons.

Senator MacEachen: Why not?

Senator Flynn: It is obvious. It has never been done, and it cannot be done!

Senator Frith: Because the House of Commons tells us what to do and we do not have any choice?

Senator Flynn: These are money bills, and you know very well that we cannot—

Senator Frith: So the House of Commons tells us how to do our work, does it?

Senator MacEachen: Let me ask you a question. Would you show me where an appropriation is made in Bill C-103?

Senator Frith: Where does it do that?

Senator Flynn: I would assume that, if there is a recommendation—

Senator Roblin: It involves the spending of money. It is clear.

Senator Flynn: —by the Governor in Council, it is a money bill. There is a recommendation—

Senator MacEachen: I am not asking whether there was a recommendation. I am asking you to tell me what part of the public revenue is appropriated in Bill C-103.

Senator Flynn: All the expenses of the agency are covered in the bill.

Senator MacEachen: But there is no money appropriated.

Senator Roblin: Why not?

Senator Flynn: There has to be—

Senator MacEachen: There isn't!

Senator Flynn: Now you are playing on words, and you will not get me with these little things.

Senator Corbin: Little things!

Senator Flynn: Senator Corbin, Eymard G., do you want to intervene?

Senator Corbin: They are fundamental matters. They are not "little things."

Senator Flynn: The bill implies the spending of money, which requires the recommendation of the Governor in Council. It is in there, and you know very well that this agency will have to have money.

Senator MacEachen: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Why does it need an order?

Senator MacEachen: Because it is not appropriated in the bill!

Senator Flynn: Yes, it is, by the mere fact—

Senator Frith: That was the basis of the ruling!

Senator MacEachen: No part of the public revenue is appropriated.

Senator Flynn: I think it is. Assets are involved.

Senator MacEachen: What amount? Tell me what amount!

Senator Flynn: I don't have to tell you what amount!

Senator MacEachen: Why not?

Senator Flynn: The moment that you provide for the payment of the president, for instance, his salary—

Senator MacEachen: But there is no provision for those funds!

Senator Flynn: There is, of course!

Senator MacEachen: Show me!

Senator Roblin: You will see in committee!

Senator Flynn: There is certainly authority in the bill to pay the president.

Senator Murray: The bill has a royal recommendation and you can't change that.

Senator MacEachen: Why does it need one?

Senator Frith: That is your problem!

Senator Flynn: The Governor in Council has to determine the amount to be paid to the president, and because you give the authority—

Senator MacEachen: You do not create an appropriation by a royal recommendation!

Senator Frith: You can't just stick a royal recommendation on something and make an appropriation!

Senator Flynn: —because you give the authority to the Governor in Council to pay the president, you have to give him the authority to spend money. You do not have to spell out the amount. That has never been required, but you have to give the authority to the government to spend, and that is there.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator MacEachen: In any event, the point does not make any difference anyway, because the bill did not originate in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: But it did. That is the point!

Senator MacEachen: Are we now to believe—

Senator Flynn: We have one bill from the House of Commons—

Senator MacEachen: —that these bills have seen the light of day in the Senate?

Senator Flynn: —and you are going to return two bills.

Senator MacEachen: That's twisting—

Senator Flynn: You know very well that when you return two bills instead of one the House of Commons will not recognize them.

Senator MacEachen: That is not the point!

Senator Flynn: And if in the opinion of the House—and the House doesn't care about your opinion in this matter—these bills are money bills, then they are dead. You know that very well.

Senator MacEachen: Your argument is pretty weak.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn baits one to intervene. The argument has been made that this is a government bill. The implication is that that fact makes the bill immune from the powers of this body or, indeed, of the House of Commons.

Senator Roblin: That is not the argument at all!

Senator Stewart: That, of course, is not accurate. For many years government bills and private members' bills were listed together. The distinction between private members' bills and government bills originated last century simply to give the government more of the time of the House of Commons. There is no distinction in the fundamental procedure of Parliament between those two kinds of bills. But, under the present rules of the House of Commons, the fact that these are government bills actually will make it easier for the bills to become law, because the government has at its disposal almost all the time the House of Commons. If the government wants the two parts of this bill to be enacted, it can make adequate time available very easily. If, indeed, these were private members' bills and if they had been produced by a division in the Senate, the problem in the other place would be far greater, because the time for private members' bills is strictly limited. In fact, there is a special procedure for private members' bills that makes it virtually impossible—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Senator MacEachen said—and the honourable senator is taking for granted that he is right—that there is no money provision in this bill.

Senator Stewart: I am not talking about that!

Senator Flynn: I refer him to clause 11(4), which says, "The president shall be paid such remuneration as may be fixed by the Governor in Council." This is an appropriation of money and this is authority to spend.

Senator Stewart: That's not a point of order—

Senator MacEachen: It is not an appropriation at all!

Senator Flynn: It is authority to spend!

Senator Stewart: That is not a point of order relevant to what I am—

Senator MacEachen: But it is not an appropriation to spend.

Senator Stewart: That is not—

Senator Flynn: Come on! You know better!

Senator Roblin: He certainly knows better, because he is stuck with it!

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not want to disrupt the other Senate which seems to be in operation in the other part of the chamber. The point that Senator Flynn just thought of is quite irrelevant to anything I am talking about. I am now talking about this bill as a government bill, not an appropriation bill. Before I come to that, I would like to summarize my point: the fact that a bill is a government bill does not make it immune to any of the normal legislative rights of the Senate.

The second point I want to suggest is that the mere fact of a message or recommendation does not make a bill an appropriation bill. It is true that a recommendation is constitutionally required—

Senator Roblin: At least you admit that!

Senator Stewart: —in the case of an appropriation bill. That is not an admission; it is a statement of fact, though I know that Senator Roblin regards it as a revelation. A bill accompanied by a recommendation is not necessarily an appropriation bill. If it were, every government with the arrogance that comes with time would tack on a recommendation to every bill so as to make it immune from certain changes in the House of Commons and the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Frith: Exactly, that is all it has to do!

Senator Stewart: This is the experience of the House of Commons at Westminster. They are very careful in this regard because they know the consequences. So what has to be done is to take a look at the facts. Does the bill in truth appropriate any part of the public revenue? Does it in fact appropriate any part of the public revenue? The mere presence of a royal recommendation does not establish that it does.

Now, where is the authority to pay the costs of these two agencies to be found? The money is provided in the Main Estimates. Is Senator Flynn suggesting that, if somehow the votes in the Main Estimates providing the supply for ACOA, et cetera, were to be deleted, this bill would be sufficient to authorize the payment of the salaries? No, he would not suggest anything as foolish as that. That is where the authorization is. I think that he, on reflection, would be inclined to agree. In any case, the recommendation provides a foundation for both parts of Bill C-103.

Senator Murray: Do you think the Estimates would be enough?

Senator MacEachen: Well, you are working on them now.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not feel that I am qualified to take part in this debate, which has now been conducted by such eminent authorities as Senator Stewart and others of similar capacity in the house, but he really has surprised me. As a gentleman who has long acquaintance with parliamentary procedure, tradition and development, he surprises me with this attempt to say that, because this bill is not an appropriation bill in the sense that the Estimates may be, it does not require a message.

Senator Stewart: I do not say that at all.

Senator Roblin: The whole issue, as I see it, is: Does the bill require a message? The answer to that, surely, is yes.

Senator Frith: Why?

Senator Roblin: It has a message. It could not have come to us unless it had a message.

Senator Frith: How do you know that? Why do you say that?

Senator Roblin: It had a message in the House of Commons. If it were not necessary that it should have a message, then those who are dealing with the procedure in that chamber would have something to say about it. It requires a message. You cannot get around that fact. Senator Stewart cannot get around that fact.

Senator Stewart: Will you tell me why it requires a message?

Senator Frith: Because they said it did. That is his point.

Senator Roblin: My friend can make any argument he likes about the desirability of a message.

Senator Frith: That's your argument!

Senator Roblin: The fact of the matter is that it received a message. Senator MacEachen knows it received a message. Senator MacEachen knows; Senator Stewart knows; this whole house knows that no bill that requires a message can be introduced in this chamber.

Now, it is futile to say that you do not agree with the fact that it received a message. Go and tell them about it, for all the good it will do you.

Senator Frith: That is not what he said at all.

Senator Roblin: The fact is that it required a message, it received a message, and nobody in this house can introduce a bill that requires a message under our Constitution.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Roblin: That is absolutely right. The Leader of the Opposition, with all his years of experience—how many bills requiring a message has he introduced? How many of those bills had money appropriations, as he is talking about now? None, not one of them.

Senator Frith: Settle down!

Senator Roblin: He stands up here and says that, because it does not contain an appropriation of money, it does not require a message, and therefore his device of splitting the bill is in order.

Personally, I am really not very concerned about the splitting of the bill. There may be merit in it. I do not know, and I have no objection to people discussing that matter, but I think they have to recognize the consequences of what they do. These consequences are simply as described by Senator Flynn, that we will be dealing in this house with part of a bill which received a message in the other place, a part to which we cannot attach a message. We are being asked to deal with a truncated matter and send it back to the other place. What do you suppose is going to happen to it there? Everybody who thinks about it for five seconds knows perfectly well that the House of Commons is not going to respond lightly to any effort of this house to interfere with its prerogatives dealing with the introduction of legislation which requires a message from Her Excellency, the Governor General. I think that what is going to happen is as clear as can be. They are going to say, "It is not a constitutional move. You should not do it."

If my learned friends do not like the way the bill has been drafted, a far more appropriate way of dealing with it, in the ordinary course of events, is to send it to committee. If they do not like what is in it, then they can amend it. It is the easiest thing in the world to do and also within the rights of this body—indeed within the rights of this body. That is the proper course of action: send it to committee, as we have already done. When it gets there, if they do not like what has happened to it, if we cannot convince my honourable friend that it deals fairly with Cape Breton and reflects its special interest—which is something dear to all of us—then that bill can be amended. If our amendments have the validity that one would hope, then we could expect it to receive some consideration in the other parts of the Parliament of Canada. However, to follow this method—which is self-defeating, if anything ever was, in terms of getting an affirmative response from the House of Commons—seems to me to be a futile waste of time.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in dealing with the motion that was moved by Senator Murray I want to put aside my frequently stated and well known reservations on the routine use of the pre-study technique and concentrate on whether there is any advantage at this time in initiating a pre-study of the free trade bill. I understand the importance and dimensions of the Free Trade Agreement. It may be a case that would normally deserve special exception, but I would ask whether there is any particular advantage at this stage in passing the motion.

The approval of Senator Murray's motion would initiate in the Senate committee an examination of the subject matter of Bill C-130 even before the debate on second reading has begun in the House of Commons, let alone examination of the bill by a Commons committee. As we all know, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is already engaged in the examination of the Free Trade Agreement. The Senate committee received its mandate on November 5, 1987. That mandate provided that the committee:

be authorized to examine and report upon elements of a Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States, tabled in the Senate on October 6, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-589), and texts subsequently agreed to . . .

Strictly speaking, the Senate committee is now engaged—and has been for six months—in the examination of the subject matter of Bill C-130, which is the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States.

I would argue that, in substance, the Free Trade Agreement and the legislation are about the same thing. The Honourable John Crosbie, Minister for International Trade, seemed to acknowledge this point in an exchange with Senator Frith on CTV's "Question Period" on May 28, 1988:

MR. CROSBIE: We were elected to govern Canada and we now have, over the last three years, worked out this Free Trade Agreement. We are asking the Senate to start studying it. Now they have had the text in their hands since last December.

SENATOR FRITH: Of the trade agreement, not the legislation.

MR. CROSBIE: Of the agreement, and all the legislation does is implement the agreement.

Giving the committee a further reference at this time, in my opinion, will not achieve any additional benefit. On the contrary, it might distract the committee from pursuing its task of understanding the substance of the agreement by calling upon it prematurely to consider the bill itself.

I can support that point of view by referring to the actual work of the committee. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs began its hearings on the Free Trade Agreement on November 17, 1987. It began the hearings with an overview. During the first four meetings the committee heard evidence from Ambassador and Deputy Chief Trade Negotiator Gordon Ritchie, the Honourable Pat Carney and Mr. Murray Smith of the Institute for Research on Public Policy. This phase provided information on the negotiations leading up to the agreement, as well as a necessary overview of the overall agreement itself. It is important to recall that those meetings were held prior to the concluding of the final text of the agreement.

In the new year, and after the final text had been agreed to by Canada and the United States, the committee proceeded to examine specific areas of the agreement, beginning with energy. During its examination of the energy sector, the committee first heard from three officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and then from an additional 30 individuals from the private sector and from the National Energy Board.

In addition to energy, hearings were held on the dispute-settlement mechanism, with evidence presented by members of the Trade Negotiator's Office and then by non-departmental authorities.

● (1740)

As members of the Senate already know, the committee spent some time on the question of federal treaty-making powers in areas of provincial jurisdiction and heard evidence from four authorities from the legal community.

The committee has not limited its hearings to Ottawa, having recently travelled to Washington for a series of informal meetings with American officials and trade authorities. Our investigation in Washington was principally on the subject of the dispute-settlement mechanism, but was not exclusively devoted to that, because other matters came to the surface in addition to dispute settlement. During that visit the members of the committee had discussions with their counterparts on a trade subcommittee of the U.S. House of Representatives, as well as with other governmental and private sector authorities.

I had intended to read the list of witnesses the committee has heard, but because of its length I ask, with leave, that we agree that the list be attached as an appendix to our Debates.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, could we agree not to see the clock so that we can finish this up this evening?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that I ignore the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator MacEachen: May I have leave to attach this list as an appendix?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See Appendix "B", p. 3613.)

Senator MacEachen: The list of witnesses will indicate to honourable senators how thorough the work of the committee has been and how relevant it is to the trade agreement and the upcoming legislation.

So, when the Honourable John Crosbie asks, as he did on CTV's "Question Period", that the Senate "start studying" the Free Trade Agreement, we must point out that the Senate has in fact been carefully studying the agreement for upwards of six months now. All that work is money in the bank, so to speak, to be drawn upon when we actually have the legislation.

I regret having gone into so much detail, but such background is essential to the argument that I am making. The committee is carefully following a particular work plan. That work plan is concentrating on certain areas of the trade agreement that are new; areas that are not normally covered in a typical trade agreement. The chairman of the committee has laid out this work plan, which has been approved, calling upon us to study, as it were, these new sectors of the agreement, of which energy is an outstanding example.

The work program to which we have already agreed should be completed by the committee. Agriculture and trade in services, including financial services, are on our future agenda. These sectors need to be explored. They would not escape thorough examination even if the bill or the subject matter of the bill were presently before the committee. Although I would argue that there is a difference between the subject matter of a bill and the legislative text, I understand that the practice has been that, if the subject matter is referred to a committee, the legislative provisions themselves are frequently examined by Senate committees. In any event, the work that we are now doing is as valuable as if we had passed a pre-study motion, because the pre-study would involve these very sectors.

From my point of view, the completion of our work program in a timely fashion will require that the committee continue its hearings in the summer. I am a member of the committee; I have attended almost all of the meetings. I have concluded that, if we are to complete the work program that we have laid out for ourselves, it will be necessary for the Foreign Affairs Committee to sit throughout the summer. Otherwise, we could not do our work. That is a matter for the committee to decide, but that is my view as a member of the committee.

In his recent "Question Period" interview, the Minister responsible for International Trade, the Honourable John Crosbie, expressed concern that senators would not "consider this deal between now and next September."

If that is a real concern of the minister, I believe that it is unjustified, because it is certainly not my opinion that it would be possible to interrupt the examination of the trade agreement at the end of June and resume at the beginning of September. The work is so important that it should be continued.

Based on those few observations, I should like to refer briefly to a number of points raised by Senator Murray in moving his motion of May 31.

I quote him as follows:

The government would like to see the Senate get a head start, as it were, on the parliamentary process by pre-studying this bill. Naturally, we are interested in that the pre-study could, and probably would, expedite the consideration of the bill, which in turn, would expedite our preparations, as a government and as a country, for its implementation.

With respect to the first point, namely, getting a head start, I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has gotten a good head start. It is very much involved in its work, has received a head start and will continue to maintain the momentum.

The second point has to do with the expedition of the bill. Senator Murray is obviously concerned, as a member of the government, in expediting the government program. But I say to him that there are many factors that will obviously influence the expedition of the bill or the program. It is my view that we are expediting the examination of the agreement and the substance of the bill, although we do not have it before us, as much now with the reference that we have as if we had the motion passed which he has put before this house. I do not think we could do a better job than what we are doing now.

Senator Murray then went on to express the view that the committee is now in an excellent position to give a thorough study to the provisions of this bill.

I believe it will be in an excellent position to study the provisions of Bill C-130, but it will be better for us to complete the present work program first. In so doing, the excellent position will then have been obtained.

There is one other point that I must make, and that is that, before we think it is appropriate to pass this motion, before we authorize a major reversal in usual parliamentary practice, as is contemplated in this motion, the Senate as a whole should know more about results in the House of Commons. I will cite just one example. As far as I know, their Speaker has not yet ruled on the admissibility of Bill C-130 in its present form. A question of order has been raised as to the admissibility of Bill C-103 and the Speaker has reserved his ruling, and, so far as I know, he has not ruled today but will rule sometime in the future. Apart from that, which is only a single point and maybe not a governing point, we have absolutely no idea what the progress of the bill through the House of Commons will be. We do not know when it will arrive in the Senate. For example, if it arrives at the end of August or mid-August, then, of course, we will be in a position to take the bill, give it second reading and have it examined in committee. So, in my view, it is a bit premature to launch a pre-study before we know precisely what is to happen.

In any event, the main point of my argument is that Senator Murray's motion is unnecessary, because we are doing as much in the committee at this time as if we were dealing with the bill or the provisions of the bill itself. The substance of Bill C-130 is the Free Trade Agreement. In his speech on the motion, Senator Murray urged "that the Senate can and should take up the substance of this free trade bill—". I want to assure him that the substance of Bill C-130 is well before the committee. We are deeply involved in the process and in the substance, and I think the press has understood this, as indicated by a recent article in the Globe and Mail, written by Christopher Waddell, who said as follows:

While the Liberal-dominated Senate may not accede to the pre-study request, in fact the Senate foreign affairs committee has met at least 16 times since last December to discuss the trade deal.

If I may interpolate, it is true that we have met at least 16 times. In fact, the committee has met 34 times and that involves a substantial amount of work. The final paragraph of Mr. Waddell's article reads as follows:

The committee has heard extensive testimony from Government witnesses, the team that negotiated the deal and outside experts on many elements of the trade pact. It also organized a trip to Washington to gain more information on the agreement.

Honourable senators, all I want to say in conclusion is that the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee is at present doing a job which needs to be done, and it is doing it in a thorough manner. I do not think that the passing of the motion at the present time would help us in any way. It might be a harmful distraction, because it may take us away from the necessary work plan that is before us at the present time. I am quite prepared to review the situation when the committee is further advanced in its work and when we know a little more about what is happening in the House of Commons with regard to Bill C-130. In the meantime, I would like to adjourn the debate.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I know that several people on this side would like to speak to the motion. Would it be possible to adjourn the debate in my name?

Senator MacEachen: Sure.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, before we adjourn the debate may I, as chairman of the committee, make one or two quick observations. I apologize, because I have been keeping witnesses in the committee room waiting since we left a few minutes ago to come to the chamber for the vote. Incidentally, I would inform other members of the committee who are here that I would appreciate it if they would come back to the committee with me in a minute or two.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. If the debate is being adjourned, I see no reason why we should extend leave beyond six o'clock for Senator van Roggen to speak.

Senator van Roggen: I want to make a supplementary comment relative to the committee which will take me about 30 seconds, if it is of interest to honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Doody, do you wish to withdraw your motion for the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Doody: Your Honour, I could hardly resist the invitation to allow a 30-second debate. It would be less than gentlemanly of me to do so.

Senator van Roggen: I want to say relative to this specific legislation, as opposed to the agreement which we are examining, that I have already instructed the staff of the committee to start comparing it, clause for clause, with the U.S. legislation, because they will have to be parallel. However, we do not even have the U.S. legislation as yet, only some rough drafts that might well be changed.

Second, should the Senate adjourn during July so that we can have some holidays around here, I have made arrangements and have spoken to several members of the committee about something which I will be proposing in a few minutes in the committee, and that is that we sit during July, not for our usual two or three hours on Tuesday but for three or four days at a time throughout July, so as to cover in one week the ground we might otherwise cover in a month or two in the hope of completing our work on the agreement, as opposed to the legislation.

Senator Phillips: Thirty seconds!

Senator van Roggen: I thank honourable senators for allowing me to add those few remarks to Senator MacEachen's.

Senator Phillips: Anybody else?

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

EMERGENCIES BILL

NOTICE OF MEETING OF STEERING COMMITTEE OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE ON BILL C-77

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may, I wish to announce that a meeting has been called for the steering committee of the Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77 when the Senate rises. It will be a very short meeting, and it will be held in room 263.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

TUESDAY, June 7, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1989 were referred, examined the said Estimates and presents, in obedience to the Order of Reference of 1 March 1988, its interim report as follows:

When it reviewed the Estimates 1988-89, the Committee followed its standard procedure of opening the hearings with the President of the Treasury Board and, following this, with a series of meetings covering a particular theme. This year, the Committee chose to examine the spending estimates of the three research granting councils, particularly in the context of the matching grants program announced by the federal government in 1986. The Committee's report on the subject of the matching grants program will be tabled in the coming weeks. The following is the interim report on the estimates:

Mr. Mazankowski, who was President of the Treasury Board at the time the Committee began its hearings, provided the Committee with an overview of the government's spending plans for 1988-89. He indicated that the government expects to make budgetary expenditures totalling $132.3 billion. Of this, the government has identified $119.4 billion in the Estimates representing a 7.7% increase over comparable estimates from the previous fiscal year. The remaining $12.9 billion is reserved for supplementary expenditures and other provisions. These are identified in Table One. (See Appendix A)

Of the $119.4 billion, $78.5 billion, or 65.7% is allocated to statutory expenditures. Public debt charges account for $32 billion, or 40% of these statutory expenditures. Non-statutory expenditures, representing the amount that Parliament is asked to authorize, account for $41 billion, or 34.3% of the total.

The value of statutory items this year represents approximately the same proportion of the total budgetary estimates as it has in the last few years. This caused some Committee members to reflect upon the difficulty of reducing the annual deficit when so much of the annual estimates are taken up with statutory expenditures. Mr. Mazankowski responded that many of the statutory items are in transfer payments to both individuals and provincial governments particularly for such program areas as social assistance, income security, and the fiscal transfers to the provinces. He did indicate that while there had been extensive review of these statutory expenditures, it was very difficult to consider changes to them because they have "become a way of life and [are] part of the Canadian tradition of sharing". The Committee speculated that within the current revenue and expenditure framework, it may be difficult for the government to reduce the annual deficit from its current level of $28.9 billion to the projected $19.5 billion by 1992-93.

The Committee also wishes to remind the government of its past observations about the potential incompatibility of the legislative requirement of annual appropriations with programs with uncertain timing of expenditures. The Committee commented on this problem in its Thirteenth Report when it reviewed the overexpenditure by the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion in Supplementary Estimates (B), 1987-88. In the same report, it also commented that the current "Payables at Year End" policy of the government is well suited to deal with this problem when departments overspend at the year end and the next fiscal year appropriations are required to complete the previous year's commitment.

However, in its report on Comprehensive Auditing (Eighteenth Report), the Committee stated;

"When governments establish programs with objectives that foster multi-year financial commitments, but with uncertain timing, those objectives may not be consistent with a system of annual appropriations; in short achieving effectiveness may not be consistent with legislative compliance."

The Committee wishes to remind the government once again of this important fact and to indicate that in its future business, the Committee will watch for and report on instances where legislative compliance and annual appropriations may not lead to effectiveness.

The Committee also wishes to voice its pleasure that the government has finally accepted its concern about the inappropriate way vote transfers are displayed in supplementary estimates. The Committee has been informed that in the first regular supplementary estimates for 1988-89, vote transfers through one-dollar votes will show considerably more information than in the past, so that parliamentarians will have a complete picture about the source of money for vote transfers and all the changes to the receiving vote.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

Chairman

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

8 June 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Bertha Wilson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 8th day of June 1988, at 4:45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,

ANTHONY P. SMYTH

Deputy Secretary, Policy and Program

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

THE HONOURABLE HERBERT O. SPARROW

FELICITATIONS ON CONFERRING OF HONORARY DOCTORATE OF SCIENCE

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to a most happy occasion that took place on Friday last, when one of our members from Saskatchewan, Senator Sparrow, was paid the very high honour of receiving an honorary Doctorate of Science from McGill University.

This honour was conferred on Senator Sparrow as a result of the study conducted by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture under his chairmanship. The committee concluded that study with its report entitled "Soil at Risk—Canada's Eroding Future", which it published in 1984. It was also in recognition of the tremendous amount of work Senator Sparrow has done since that time in promoting not only the results of the study but in being extremely active all across Canada, in a great many parts of the United States and even as far away as Australia, in promoting the principle behind this study, that is, the necessity of taking action, and taking action immediately, not only in Canada but all over the world to stop this most serious erosion of soil, which puts at risk the worldwide production of foodstuffs.

Senator Sparrow has spoken perhaps 250 or 300 times in almost every part of Canada and in many places in the United States. He was eventually sent by the United Nations to address a conference on soil degradation in Australia.

He has been awarded many honours in this country and in the U.S. He was also granted a medal by the United Nations for the tremendous amount of work he did as a result of this important study. The honours culminated on Friday last when Senator Sparrow was awarded an honorary Doctorate of Science from McGill University.

The study which culminated in the report issued in 1984 was extremely timely, not only in terms of the situation in Canada but in terms of the global situation, because it has captured the attention of governments and people involved in the production of food and in agriculture around the world.

Senator Sparrow has been tireless in his efforts to promote this report. He has spoken to governments, universities, business groups, agricultural groups and, recently, has become the founding president of an organization called "Soil Conservation Canada", which is supported by governments and agricultural groups in Canada.

I believe that the honour paid to Senator Sparrow reflects on the work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and by the Senate. The great work done by the Senate of Canada and its committees is frequently overlooked. Among the great studies that have been done, for example, are the study on poverty and the study on the media. Many studies have been carried out by the Senate over the years and have been of tremendous value to Canadians, as well as to those beyond the borders of Canada.

Therefore, at this time I congratulate the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and I congratulate Senator Sparrow. I know that we are all very proud of the work that he has done. It has brought honour to Senator Sparrow. It has brought honour to the Senate. I know that he will carry on this tremendous job he has undertaken on our behalf and on behalf of the agriculture industry in Canada.

I might say that at no time in the history of Canada, except perhaps in the "dirty thirties", were the results of such a study more important to western Canada. The unfortunate soil use and farming practices that are still being carried out are resulting in a tremendous amount of erosion of our topsoil. The study was timely in 1984; it is even more timely now in 1988.

Again, congratulations, Senator Sparrow. Keep up the good work.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on behalf of this side of the chamber, I join in extending congratulations to Senator Sparrow. We recall the excellent planning he did for the committee work. Indeed, we recall the canvassing he did prior to establishing the committee, when perhaps not everyone was convinced of the necessity of carrying out the study on soil erosion. We are pleased that the report has been so widely accepted and acknowledged, as many of the honours cited by Senator Steuart have indicated, but we are especially anxious to join in the statement that the honour accorded by McGill University is partly due to the fact that Senator Sparrow has devoted so much time to explaining the report, getting it publicity and getting people to understand it since it was presented to the chamber.

I think this is most important, because in the past many excellent reports have been published and then more or less forgotten. Senator Sparrow has spoken repeatedly on the committee's report and, as a result of that report and his work afterwards, is well deserving of the honour.

We all join in extending congratulations to him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I join my colleagues in congratulating Senator Sparrow. I did not know until now that he had received this honorary degree.

I agree with all that has been said, but there is one thing that has not been said that I would like to say, and that is that not only did Senator Sparrow have this study done, not only was he the instigator of it and the chairman who kept us all working on the committee and who made sure that we got the word out after the committee report was tabled, but Senator Sparrow kept talking and pointing out the importance of the report.

Until today every province in Canada is using this as a guide and in their schools. The Departments of Agriculture, Forestry and Soil are now doing things to preserve the land and the topsoil. They are now changing their habits, not only in agriculture but in wildlife, in the streams and other things, and they have used this as a base. The whole history of Canada's soil and agriculture and forestry and wildlife has changed since 1984, since "Soil at Risk" was first put out as a report.

Even the Government of Canada is using this report as a basis for progress. That is why the Americans are looking to Canada and are asking Senator Sparrow to go down there to speak to their agrologists; that is why the United Nations has asked to hear from Senator Sparrow; that is why Australia asked to hear from Senator Sparrow. They are looking to Canada for leadership, and Senator Sparrow is the leader in this regard in Canada.

Every province in Canada since 1984 has made tremendous strides in the area of soil preservation, in changing their agricultural policies, in changing the way they plough their lands, in changing the way they treat their hedgerows, in changing the way they develop their streams and in changing the way they construct dams and so forth. They are doing that because of Senator Sparrow's report.

There are many more honours to come to Senator Sparrow, and I congratulate him on this one.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues in congratulating Senator Sparrow on the occasion of his being honoured with an Honorary Doctorate from McGill University. Senator Sparrow's work on the "Soil at Risk" report, when he was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, has indeed brought great credit to that committee, to the Senate of Canada and to the Parliament of Canada. It demonstrated to everyone how someone can make an important public contribution outside of the traditional minister-parliamentary secretary roles.

I should like to join with all honourable senators in wishing Senator Sparrow continued success with his work on the soil erosion problems that we are experiencing in Canada and in the world.

While I was not in the Senate at the time the report was prepared, I have heard a great deal about it and have referred to it on many occasions. It is an excellent report and, again, an inspiration to us all as to what can be done by Senate committees and, indeed, by any parliamentary committee.

I know that this is one of many honours Senator Sparrow has received, and I hope he will receive many more because he is most deserving of them.

PRIVATE BILL

MONTREAL TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. Michel Cogger presented Bill S-17, an Act to authorize the Montreal Trust Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Cogger, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, June 14, 1988.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Could we have an explanation of why leave is being asked?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): This had better be good!

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips, my friend in good times and bad, has requested an explanation, which I am happy to provide.

When this particular bill, to which I will refer in a moment, was referred to us, we scheduled a meeting for this afternoon to take place after the Senate had risen. Since then two factors have intruded that cause me to move this motion. One is that we are to have Royal Assent this afternoon; the other is that there is to be a meeting of the National Finance Committee at six o'clock. So there is a possible conflict there for those of us who would like to be able to attend both meetings. However, having looked at the bill which the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will consider this afternoon I find that it is an amendment to the excise tax and should involve only a short period of time. So not only should we be able to attend both committees but we may have the opportunity to pay our respects to the Queen as well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCIES BILL

EXAMINATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION RE APPEARANCE AND SEATING OF WITNESSES ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have two motions dealing with the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77. I am going to ask leave to move both of them. However, if honourable senators prefer, I can change this to a notice of motion.

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

That witnesses be called to appear before the Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof; and

That the witnesses be permitted to sit at a special table provided for that purpose.

These provisions are the same as those made for the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Accord.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXAMINATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STILL PHOTOGRAPHY AND TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I further move:

That a still photography pool be permitted to record the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof;

That pool television cameras also be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of the said Committee; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, where applicable.

Honourable senators, with respect to the question of leave, this motion is in the same form as used previously and is intended to provide access, not automatic televising.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I, before granting leave, ask the Honourable Senator Frith if he is expecting the former Prime Minister Trudeau again, because I notice the drappings are the same as we used at the time of his visit during Meech Lake? Second, I should like to inquire if he expects the same enthusiastic demand by the media for coverage of the Committee of the Whole today as was the case on the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on question No. 1, no; on question No. 2, no.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA POST CORPORATION

TRANSFER OF POST OFFICES TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—NUMBER AND LOCATION IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us how many of the 102 post offices in Canada that are to be converted to private enterprise are in Atlantic Canada, in Prince Edward Island in particular, and could he name those post offices?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with great respect, I think that is precisely the type of question—seeking, as it does, statistical information—that should be put on the order paper for a written reply.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps the honourable senator could get the information for me tomorrow.

Senator Murray: Perhaps the honourable senator could put the question on the order paper and a written reply will be brought in.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to questions.

ENERGY

HEAVY OILS—CONSTRUCTION OF UPGRADER AT LLOYDMINSTER, SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to questions raised on May 10, 1988, by Senator Olson and Senator van Roggen, regarding Energy—Heavy Oils—Construction of Upgrader at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan—Government Funding.

(The answer follows:)

On April 29, the Honourable Marcel Masse announced that Husky Oil Limited and the Governments of Canada, Alberta, and Saskatchewan had reached an agreement on a Statement of Principles relating to the $1.3 billion bi-provincial upgrader project near Lloydminster.

The Statement will allow Husky Oil to seek new private equity participation in the financing of the upgrader project.

Private equity contributions would finance half of the project costs. Husky had sought, and received, a financial package from the three governments that would enable the company to attract new private equity for the upgrader project. Government participation would involve low-interest loans to cover the other half of total project costs.

Husky is currently in the process of negotiating with other private sector participants. Government officials are not at liberty to release the agreement pending finalization of these negotiations.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

RE-ENERGIZING OF DEBT STRATEGY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PROPOSAL—INTERPRETATION OF DELAYED ANSWER—REQUEST FOR MORE SPECIFIC ANSWER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to questions raised on May 11, 1988, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, and on May 18, 1988, by the Honourable George van Roggen, regarding the Economic Summit, 1988—Re-energizing of Debt Strategy—Possible

[Senator Murray.]

Canadian Proposal—Interpretation of Delayed Answer—Request for More Specific Answer.

The honourable senators' remarks have been drawn to the attention of the responsible official in the Department of External Affairs, who has expressed sincere regret that his responses to earlier questions have caused offence. The reference to a "magic wand" was caused by what he understood to be a reference to calls by some bankers for the establishment of an international debt facility funded by governments to buy up at a discount commercial bank loans to indebted developing countries. Clearly, this interpretation was unwarranted by the actual text of the honourable senator's question, and the unfortunate reference would have been misplaced in any case.

The Canadian government is indeed hoping to achieve further progress in easing the debt burden of the poorest, indebted sub-Saharan African countries. The honourable senators will undoubtedly have noted recent press reports concerning a possible compromise on the issue of concessional interest rates on officially supplied and guaranteed credits rescheduled by the Paris Club. This compromise was devised by Canadian officials in the course of discussions in the Paris Club on the treatment of the debts of the poorest countries. Hopefully the compromise will be finalized at the Toronto Summit, if not before. Such a step would be a significant addition to the measures already implemented for these countries at the IMF, the Paris Club, and through the World Bank.

As to the debt of Middle-Income countries, the government will seek to improve the implementation of the case by case approach, as is set out in the speech of the Honourable Minister of Finance to the Interim Committee of the IMF on April 14 (copy attached).

Interim Committee Meeting

April 14, 1988

Intervention by the Honourable Michael H. Wilson
Minister of Finance for Canada

(p.m. session)

1. Debt Situation and Strategy

This afternoon's discussion is a particularly timely one that allows us an opportunity to reflect on progress during the past year and to look ahead to the challenges that must still be met. I believe the Fund and the other players in the world's debt problems—in both the poorest and the middle-income countries—can do more.

As we reflect on the events of the past year, it is clear that substantial progress has been made in increasing the amounts of concessional financing available to the poorest countries.

The IDA VIII replenishment has come into effect;

Donor governments have resoundingly supported the World Bank's special program of assistance for Sub-Saharan Africa; and,

The IMF has established a new source of concessional lending—the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility.

These efforts, however, are not sufficient to resolve the debt problems confronting the poorest countries. Some way must be found to ensure that these countries have a reasonable prospect of meeting their debt service requirements. On this point, there is broad agreement among donor governments. Canada remains of the view that rescheduling commercial export credits at concessional rates through the Paris Club represents the most viable channel to provide such assistance. However, the Paris Club has yet to reach consensus on this issue. The challenge we face is to find ways soon by which creditors can effectively contribute the much needed assistance.

The debt situation of the middle-income countries remains worrisome, particularly in light of the continued global expansion. Progress is lacking in reducing the debt burden of many problem debtors. In many cases, economic adjustment and growth in real income continues to be discouraging.

We recognize that commercial banks have built up their capital bases and increased loan loss provisions. These actions have contributed to somewhat diminished concerns about systemic risk. However, they have also tended to lessen the cohesion which earlier characterized the commercial banks' approach to the debt problem.

It is increasingly evident that fatigue with the debt problem is growing among both debtor countries and commercial banks. Debtor countries understandably find it difficult to make the political decisions to enter into and sustain adjustment programs with the international financial institutions. Commercial banks, for their part, are faced with the need to raise capital in financial markets which are skeptical about loans to many LDCs. Understandably, therefore, banks are more reluctant to join in new money packages. I believe we have entered a new phase in the debt strategy in which debtors are now attempting to capture a share of the relatively large secondary market discounts. But substantial new money inflows will still be required by most to support their adjustment efforts.

Renewed efforts must be made on all fronts to re-energize the debt strategy. The international financial institutions have a pivotal role in facilitating macroeconomic adjustment and long-term development. They must extend and better coordinate their activities.

Debtor countries have a central responsibility to free up their economies in order to enhance their economic performance, attract equity investment and reverse capital flight. The International Finance Corporation and the newly established Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency are in place to support this process.

Efforts by both international financial institutions and commercial banks must also continue to broaden the menu of options. International financial institutions can also play a role in pursuing new and innovative techniques on a case-by-case basis designed to increase financial flows to debtor countries.

And major creditor governments must remove inappropriate regulatory obstacles, and in this way, reinforce the process.

The World Bank has a key role to play both in its own right and through increased cooperation with the Fund. The contribution of the Bank and the Fund can be greater than their individual efforts if their programs build on each other's strengths. During the past year, the World Bank, of necessity, has spent a great deal of time looking inward. It is now time to look outward again. I will elaborate on the importance of enhancing the debt management role of the Bank during tomorrow's session.

The Fund, for its part, continues to have an important role in the debt strategy: to design appropriate adjustment strategies, to monitor policy implementation, and to provide financing itself. I noted this morning the importance of structural policy reform. This is so for developed and developing countries alike. I encourage the Fund to use their influence in this element for economic growth.

There are two ways in which the Fund can give confidence to creditors and debtors that the debt problem can be managed. First, Fund conditionality must give credible assurance that policy problems are being firmly addressed. Second, the Fund's own lending, together with the World Bank, must be adequate to provide an incentive for borrowers to adhere to adjustment programs.

Before I conclude, I would like to draw to your attention a statement from Prime Minister Seaga, regarding the special problems of small middle-income debtors. I would like this statement to become part of the record of our deliberations.

Let me conclude by stressing that the Fund's primary role must be to encourage and support sound monetary, fiscal and structural policies and responsible external policies. There are no alternatives to credible and rigorous adjustment. But Fund lending must be flexible enough to ensure that good programs remain intact. The Fund can help improve the debt situation most by inspiring confidence that its programs will work.

2. Role of the Fund in Adjustment and Financing

With regard to unexpected external events, the development of an External Contingency Mechanism is a welcome addition to the Fund's ability to respond to unforeseen developments which throw programs off-track. Any such contingency mechanism must maintain the conditionality needed to ensure that the underlying adjustment priorities affecting the balance of payments are being addressed. I endorse the Fund's proposals for this facility.

The Extended Fund Facility has been much discussed recently. This facility deserves a more important role in the future, and recent modifications should make it more attractive. However, if the Facility is to be a major tool of medium-term financial support, the Fund should use it to ensure that a solid record of adjustment is achieved.

I have regularly expressed my support for stronger Fund/Bank cooperation. I see an excellent opportunity for such cooperation in the Extended Fund Facility. Both institutions need to encourage medium-term adjustment. The Fund and Bank should examine the possibility of forging stronger cooperative links between EFF lending and World Bank structural adjustment lending. One way this could be achieved is through an expanded role for Policy Framework Papers.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACQUIRED IMMUNE DEFICIENCY SYNDROME—EDUCATION, RESEARCH AND TREATMENT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised on May 18 last, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding Health and Welfare—Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome—Education, Research and Treatment—Government Assistance.

The federal government has committed $4 million to education on AIDS in direct funding, and additional funds to community-based AIDS organizations to provide education, counselling and other services at the community level. In addition, the government has committed nearly $2 million to date to support essential research on the knowledge, behaviour and attitudes of Canadians related to the AIDS issue for the development and effective delivery of education programs and to collaborative education projects and programs with others.

Approximately one-quarter of the non-laboratory personnel resources of the Federal Centre for AIDS are devoted to the development of AIDS education programs and extensive advisory support to provinces, communities, non-government organizations and the private sector. It should also be noted that virtually every conference held in Canada on any aspect of the AIDS problem is supported in part or in whole by the federal government. Such gatherings play a vital role in AIDS education and understanding of the problem.

At the present time, there are 781 reported active cases of AIDS in Canada. AZT is the only drug shown to have been of benefit in the treatment of AIDS and is the only treatment generally available to AIDS patients throughout the world. A number of drugs with antiviral activity or which may modify the immune system are at various stages of clinical trial in the United States and elsewhere.

The Federal Centre for AIDS is continually negotiating with the manufacturers of such drugs and with Canadian clinical investigators to gain access to these drugs and organize appropriate clinical trials in Canada. Trials on a number of potentially useful new drugs are either being started or are likely to commence within the next few months.

Applications for regulatory approval to carry out clinical studies are reviewed immediately on receipt and a satisfactory study can commence sixty days following such receipt. Funds from the National Health Research and Development Program of the Department of Health and Welfare are available to prepare and conduct studies and to assist and encourage manufacturers who would otherwise not be agreeable to conducting such studies in Canada.

No suitable application for funding has yet been rejected.

Further initiatives to stimulate more foreign pharmaceutical manufacturers to conduct clinical research in Canada as well as to encourage new drug development within Canada are imminent.

Orphan legislation of the type adopted by the United States whereby exclusive marketing rights can be awarded to a single company following successful trials is unlikely to provide greater access to experimental drugs in Canada; there is some evidence that it may have the opposite effect. However, a number of legislative options related to this situation are currently under consideration.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, for the second reading of the Bill C-51, An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand, unless someone else wishes to speak to it. I intend to speak on Tuesday next, but I have no objection to anyone else's speaking to it today or tomorrow.

Order stands.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

POINT OF ORDER—BILL S-4 WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the point of order on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour), for the second reading of the Bill C-204, An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have asked for advice on this point of order, raised, I think, by Senator Phillips. It seems that there is an argument to support Senator Phillips and that there is also an argument to support the proposition that the two bills can coexist here. But I ask honourable senators to approach this matter from the perspective of what we hope to achieve rather than to seek a ruling on this point, thereby initiating a long debate and creating perhaps an undesirable precedent. I say "perhaps" undesirable, not necessarily undesirable. I think our objective is to deal with Bill C-204 and Bill C-51. I know there is a great deal of support in the chamber for the adoption of both bills.

• (1420)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: For both Bill C-204 and Bill C-51?

Senator Frith: There is support for Bill C-204 and Bill C-51, but not for the "S" bill, if it is covered by the others. Therefore, if Senator Haidasz is prepared to take the necessary procedural steps to withdraw the "S" bill, we can then proceed with second reading of Bill C-204.

As I understand it, if we pass Bill C-51 and Bill C-204, we will have achieved everything that Senator Haidasz wants to achieve. If it is suitable, I suggest that we not ask for a ruling on the point of order, but, either today or tomorrow, make sure of the procedural technique for accomplishing our purpose. If honourable senators agree, we can then allow Senator Haidasz to speak on Bill C-204 today, pending that procedure tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: But he is the one who has to make the decision on Bill S-4.

Senator Frith: Precisely. If Senator Haidasz wants to speak on Bill C-204, he will have to preface his remarks by saying that he agrees with doing whatever is necessary to get Bill S-4 out of the way.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps we should ask Senator Haidasz to withdraw Bill S-4.

Senator Frith: If that is satisfactory, that is all right with us.

Senator Flynn: That is the only way he can do it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: It depends on what Senator Haidasz has to say.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith has made a suggestion. Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we should follow his suggestion?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe it is agreeable, but it would be nice if Senator Haidasz told us what he thinks about this.

Senator Frith: The Speaker is asking whether, if Senator Haidasz is prepared to withdraw Bill S-4, we are prepared to grant him leave to withdraw it. We would have to hear whether or not he is prepared to do so.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Let him tell us.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on the point of order raised by Senator Phillips and spoken to by Senator Flynn and Senator Frith, in view of the fact that Bill C-204 accomplishes more than Bill S-4, which has been in committee for approximately one year—

Senator Doody: Happy birthday!

Senator Haidasz: —and in view of the fact that Bill C-204 is complementary to Bill C-51, which we also want to see passed, I therefore ask leave to have Bill S-4 withdrawn from the Orders of the Day and from the committee's agenda.

Senator Frith: Because Bill S-4 is in committee, if Senator Haidasz agrees, he could moved the following motion:

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 47(2),

That the Order of the Senate of Wednesday, 11th March, 1987, for the second reading and the reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology of the Bill S-4, An Act to amend the Hazardous Products Act (tobacco and tobacco products), be rescinded; and

That the said Bill be withdrawn.

That gets rid of both the reference to committee and the bill itself.

Senator Haidasz: I so move.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, Bill S-4 withdrawn.

BILL C-204—SECOND READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, once again I move the second reading of Bill C-204, and I welcome this opportunity to debate, on second reading, this bill, a private member's bill from the other place, introduced by the honourable member for Broadview-Greenwood.

The purpose of Bill C-204 is to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers of transportation and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.

This bill was given thorough study under the new rules in the other place by a special legislative committee. On February 11 this year it was approved with amendments and sent back to the House, where it was given third reading on May 31, following the third reading of the government Bill C-51.

Bill C-204 was given significant support on a free vote by members of all parties in the other place. However, 14 members of the cabinet voted against it and the Minister of National Health and Welfare was absent for the vote. Nevertheless, the honourable member for Broadview-Greenwood is to be commended for her success—especially for her determined efforts in promoting this important health issue.

I am sure honourable senators would like to join me in congratulating the honourable member for Broadview-Greenwood on her singular achievement in getting third reading of her private bill, Bill C-204. I can well understand her great satisfaction and elation in getting her private bill passed in the other place—being a member of an opposition party—and something that I also felt when the House passed my private bill, Bill C-164, in 1972, granting a federal charter to Unity Bank, Canada's tenth federal bank, a bill which was later passed by the Senate and given Royal Assent.

The Senate has heard many comprehensive speeches on this important health issue in the past three and a half years, dating from January 1985, when Senator Bosa initiated a debate on the hazardous effects of tobacco smoking, and subsequently I introduced Bill S-8, to protect non-smokers. It was a great source of satisfaction to me that the Senate gave it second reading and referred it to committee. This also applied later that year to Bill S-4 of November 1986, to ban tobacco advertising. Both of these bills were similar to Bill C-204.

This bill focuses on the need to protect non-smokers by providing designated smoking areas in the federal workplace and on the need to discourage this lethal habit by banning the advertising of tobacco products.

The dangers of tobacco smoking were reported by medical authorities as early as 1859 in France, after a study of 68 pipe and cigar smokers who died of cancer of the lip.

In 1938 Johns Hopkins Medical School Professor Pearl proved beyond all doubt that the mortality rate among tobacco smokers was much higher than that of non-smokers. After World War II one of my professors, Toronto thoracic surgeon, Dr. Norman Delarue, demonstrated the relationship between bronchogenic carcinoma and cigarette smoking. Since that time also medical scientists and epidemiologists have linked tobacco to cancer of the bronchii, larynx, tongue, pancreas and urinary bladder; and also to chronic lung diseases, such as emphysema and bronchitis, in addition to some cardiovascular disorders. Recently, however, there has been an increasing awareness of the dangers of inhalation by non-smokers of second-hand or sidestream smoke, often called environmental tobacco smoke. The weight of scientific evidence points to a relationship between exposure to sidestream tobacco smoke and many respiratory and cardiovascular diseases. Pregnant women, also asthmatic individuals and young children appear to be at greatest risk for environmental tobacco smoke.

• (1430)

Epidemiologists in Canada tell us that approximately 35,000 Canadians died in 1985 from tobacco-related diseases and, among them, 300 non-smokers died from inhaling sidestream tobacco smoke. Furthermore, the economic loss to Canada, in addition to the suffering and death of 35,000 Canadians annually, was estimated to be $8 billion in 1982, according to Statistics Canada.

It is a tragic and undeniable fact that tobacco is the number one preventable health problem in Canada today. In order to deal with this major medical and economic problem, health authorities and many health organizations mounted an intensive campaign to prod various levels of government to take serious and effective measures to restrict the use of tobacco and to protect the health of Canadians.

I should add that nicotine in tobacco is also described by medical experts as being a product whose addictive properties are almost equal to those of heroin.

In light of these serious facts and losses, honourable senators, many people feel that tobacco products should be declared hazardous and that their advertising, sale and importation should be controlled, as is the case with many other seemingly less dangerous products. Many city governments, especially Toronto and Vancouver, followed by the federal and provincial governments and the commercial airlines, have finally taken progressive measures to restrict the use of tobacco in public places and to curtail tobacco advertising.

One of the major purposes of this bill, C-204, is the regulation of smoking in the workplace, as far as the federal jurisdiction is concerned. This is dealt with primarily in clauses 3 and 4 of the bill. The basic thrust of these provisions would be to ensure that every employer who is subject to federal jurisdiction shall provide a smoke-free environment in the office or other work space. Smoking would be permitted only in a designated smoking room and, in the case of buildings constructed after January 1, 1990, this room would have to be enclosed and independently ventilated.

Clause 5 of Bill C-204 would extend the ban on smoking, except in a designated smoking area, to common carriers under federal jurisdiction, such as aircraft, ships, railway cars and certain passenger motor vehicles, such as interprovincial buses. The clause would entrench the current regulations under the Aeronautics Act banning smoking entirely on flights of two hours or less. Such flights account for more than 65 per cent of commercial air routes in Canada. At least one-third of passenger railcars would have to be smoke-free.

Clause 6 sets forth various penalties for failure to comply with the bill. These would consist of monetary fines and the maximum penalties would depend on whether the offence was a first or a subsequent offence. In addition, as stated in clause 5, any person who refused to stop smoking on an aircraft where it was forbidden could be removed at the next scheduled landing.

The Governor in Council would be given extensive regulation-making powers by clause 7 of the bill.

Clause 9 of Bill C-204, which resembles my bill, Bill S-4, would also add products manufactured from tobacco to the list of products covered by the Hazardous Products Act. This would enable the Governor in Council to pass regulations regarding the advertising, sale and importation of such products. The government's bill, Bill C-51, the Tobacco Products Control Act, would also deal with advertising of tobacco products. To avoid a possible conflict between the two bills, C-204 and C-51, if they were both enacted, Bill C-204 provides that the Hazardous Products Act would not apply if Bill C-51 were in force.

As a result of amendments at the committee stage, I do not believe there was any conflict between the effects of Bill C-204 and Bill C-51.

Bill C-51, rather than the amended Hazardous Products Act, would apply to the advertising and promotion of tobacco products. It has, in fact, been argued that the addition of tobacco products to the Hazardous Products Act, as proposed by Bill C-204, could assist in supporting Bill C-51 against any constitutional challenge. As I said, Bill C-204 deals with smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers, subjects that are not covered by Bill C-51. The government has already announced its policy: Smoking in the federal public service is to be completely prohibited by January 1, 1989, while it is anticipated that regulations under the Canada Labour Code will be implemented to restrict smoking in federally-regulated sectors. These policies, however, are not entrenched in legislation.

The government's policy prohibits smoking altogether, at least in the federal public service, while Bill C-204 would allow smoking in designated smoking rooms. Originally Bill C-204 required such rooms to be enclosed and separately ventilated, but this provision was removed by the legislative committee in the other place. Now they only need to be enclosed and separate ventilation is required only in buildings constructed after January 1, 1990. There is no requirement for a smoking room to be provided, although its absence would mean that no smoking at all would be allowed. It should also be noted that Bill C-204, unlike the government's policy, would apply to the House of Commons, the Senate and the Library of Parliament.

Of course, there is controversy over the regulation of smoking in the workplace. Nevertheless, many private sector employers and municipalities, as well as several government departments and agencies, have already instituted such policies. Whether tobacco is the major cause of indoor pollution or merely one of several is also debated by many experts. It is, however, seen as a preventable irritant, and one that can and should be addressed. This is not to deny that many other problems of ventilation and indoor air quality must also be dealt with.

As far as various modes of transportation are concerned, both government policy and consumer demand have caused major changes. I believe that this bill will help a great deal to promote better health standards in Canada. The opponents of this bill who cry that it curtails freedom of commercial speech have no solid ground, because the guarantees in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Preventing the promotion of tobacco, which is a lethal product, a killer, although still legal, is reasonable and justified by the evidence of the numerous deaths and diseases that are the result of tobacco use. In theory, the best way to prevent deaths from tobacco is to outlaw tobacco, but our society is not ready for that as yet.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, we will hear much more about this problem after the bill is referred to committee. I urge honourable senators to give their support to Bill C-204 by giving it second reading as soon as possible and referring it to the appropriate committee without further delay.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Haidasz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

EMERGENCIES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole.

Pursuant to Order adopted earlier this day, Mr. W. Snarr, Executive Director, Emergency Preparedness Canada, and Mr. H.J.L. Molot, General Counsel, Advisory and Administrative Law Section, Department of Justice, were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, with us now are Mr. Snarr and Mr. Molot who, I am sure you will remember, attended with the minister at the previous meeting of the Committee of the Whole. I am sure they will be pleased to answer any questions honourable senators may have.

The Chairman: On behalf of the Committee of the Whole, I should like to welcome back Mr. Snarr and Mr. Molot and invite them, if they so wish, to make a preliminary statement.

If not, the Chair is prepared to recognize honourable senators who wish to speak.

Since I gather there is no opening statement, I call on Senator Stewart, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): There are several points on which I think these two gentlemen can be most helpful. I have a list of those points, but it may be that other senators will want to intervene; if so, I would be more than happy to give way.

My first question relates to the matter of overseas service by conscripted personnel. On May 31, at page 3531 of Debates of the Senate, the minister said:

...with regard to conscription, our advice is that this would be legally possible by order in council under Part IV of Bill C-77...

He then turned to the question of sending conscripted Canadians overseas. In this regard, he stated that the Charter provides an obstacle in that it forbids forcing Canadian citizens to leave the country. He quoted section 6(1) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which states:

Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada.

However, he also drew attention to section 1 of the Charter, which states that the Charter guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. He told the committee that to send conscripted troops overseas the test of section 1 of the Charter would have to be met.

My question is this: Is it not true that section 1 of the Charter would be no more of an obstacle or restraint on the government in the case of conscripted personnel than it would be in the case of volunteered personnel?

Mr. W. Snarr, Executive Director, Emergency Preparedness Canada: Section 1 of the Charter is a limitation on any action to limit the rights individuals have under the Charter. If a person were asked to leave the country in service of the country and had no objections, obviously there would be no impediment either way. Section 1 would arise if an individual who was being forced to leave took exception to that action and contested the government's authority to do it, in which case he would have recourse to the courts. In those circumstances, the government would have to demonstrate that its action in sending him overseas was reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, you are asserting that the status of conscripted personnel would not be materially different from that of volunteered personnel; is that correct?

Mr. Snarr: The difference only arises—subject to advice from Mr. Molot—on the legal fine points. It seems to me that the difference would only arise in terms of the individual's desire to have access to, or to exercise, his rights under the Charter.

[The Chairman:]

• (1450)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The question is—whether or not he wished to exercise his rights—would there be a difference in their status?

Mr. Snarr: I do not think so.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is fine.

I want to turn to quite a different point. At page 3534 of Debates of the Senate the minister stated—and I had better have his words before me—that:

—there is a constitutional requirement that there be—

Senator Frith: Could Senator Stewart tell us where that passage is to be found on that page.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I will find it. I simply wrote down the passage and the page number.

Senator Frith: That is fine.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): It is on page 3534; however, I cannot put my finger on the line. He stated:

—there is a constitutional requirement that there be a bill to appropriate funds.

The preliminary question is: How immediate to the appropriation does the bill have to be?

We were referring to clause 30(1)(j). I should like to ask now what specific requirements does the government have in mind when it asks for the authority to make orders of the kind that would be authorized under that particular subclause?

Mr. Snarr: Mr. Chairman, clause 30(1)(j) authorizes the government to make orders or regulations concerning expenditures. The presumption is that these would be expenditures of funds which had already been appropriated or voted by Parliament.

There are a number of acts of Parliament—the Defence Production Act and some of the legislation dealing with the procurement of supplies—that authorize the government to make these expenditures through revolving funds, but in several cases there are limits put on the expenditure of the funds, regardless of or independent of the total amount of money that had been appropriated through legislation.

The purpose of clause 30(1)(j) is to permit those limits to be altered, presumably in the positive direction, to enable the government to rapidly expand its procurement program to meet the needs of an emergency, particularly an emergency looking toward possible hostilities and the government needing to acquire materiel for the mobilization of the armed forces.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The government is not asking for that specific authorization in the case of a war emergency. Why is no such specific authorization sought in the case of Part IV or war emergency?

Mr. Snarr: The general approach taken to Part IV was that, because of the extreme gravity of a war emergency, where the future existence of the country is at stake, and the complete unpredictability of the way in which the situation might unfold and what demands may be put on the country to meet such an emergency, the widest possible scope should be given to the government to take action necessary to meet the contingencies.

So, in that respect, clause 40(1) gives very general authority to the government to take whatever action the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, is necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency. This is quite similar to the bare bones power that was included in the War Measures Act.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): If the government were to declare an international or war emergency when Parliament was adjourned, would it be possible to appropriate money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for purposes not covered by any other appropriation?

Mr. Snarr: I think there is provision under the system of Governor General's Warrants by which appropriations can be made when Parliament is not in session.

Perhaps I can ask Mr. Molot if he is familiar with the finer points of the limitations of the government with regard to appropriating funds through Governor General's Warrants.

Mr. H.J.L. Molot, General Counsel, Advisory and Administrative Law Section, Department of Justice: I am not that familiar with the finer points. There is a system in place under the Financial Administration Act, but the requirements under that particular act would have to be met in order for the warrants to be available. They are only used in extraordinary circumstances.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Resort to the use of Governor General's Warrants is not all that rare. The circumstances you have described may be extraordinary, but the use of warrants is not all that unusual.

I asked specifically about the situation when Parliament was adjourned. I know about Governor General's warrants.

Mr. Molot: Do you mean, apart from Governor General's warrants, what other method of appropriation is there?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What I am asking is: Is it contemplated—we were told that the government had looked ahead and tried to anticipate any eventuality—that if the government had to declare an international or war emergency when Parliament was adjourned, the government would use Governor General's warrants for its new financial requirements? Is that what you have in mind?

Mr. Molot: No, we do not have that in mind. That is, I suppose, a possibility, but I think the straightforward approach would be that if Parliament were adjourned at the time that the money was needed then Parliament would be recalled.

There are other provisions in the bill in which Parliament's role is essential, as you are aware, and so Parliament's presence is necessary in order to—

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let me put before you a more difficult situation. In the event that Parliament were dissolved, would it be the intention of the government to use Governor General's warrants?

Mr. Snarr: Mr. Chairman, it would be the intention of the government to take whatever action was necessary, in the interests of the survival of the nation, within the bounds of what is constitutionally and legally possible. Certainly, if Parliament were dissolved and the only recourse to the funds that were required was through Governor General's warrants, that would be the intention.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, if that circumstance ever arose, the intention would be to make use of Governor General's warrants. Is that your response?

Mr. Snarr: I think this would be the avenue of last resort, yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You implied that there are other avenues. What we are trying to discover is what we are delegating, and when you say "this would be the avenue of last resort", what other avenues are you implying? Do you have any in mind? Frankly, I do not know of any. You seem to suggest that there are others.

Mr. Snarr: The other avenue would be to go through Parliament and appropriate funds in the normal fashion.

• (1500)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, assuming that Parliament had been dissolved, the government would be left only with Governor General's warrants. That is understandable.

My third point relates to taxation. At page 3531 of Debates of the Senate, the minister dealt with a question that I had raised concerning taxation. He said:

Finally, with regard to taxation, I am pleased to say that I can give a short, unequivocal answer. Taxes cannot be imposed by order in council. The Constitution sets out quite specific procedures for levying taxes and a bill is always required.

It is elementary that new taxes must have a statutory basis, but the bill now before us prompts two questions. The first is: Can Parliament delegate the power to impose a tax? The second is: If so, is the government, by this bill, asking Parliament to delegate the power to impose taxation? Those are the two questions I would like to have answered.

Mr. Snarr: In answer to the first question, the advice we have been given is that Parliament cannot delegate the power to levy new taxes. In the light of that information, I think the second question is irrelevant.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes. When you say "we have been given", you are not now speaking as a minister; so are you implying that you have outside counsel on this point?

Mr. Snarr: Perhaps I should have said that the answer I have been given by the Department of Justice is as I stated.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, that is Mr. Molot's answer?

Mr. Snarr: I assume that Mr. Molot has the full resources of the department at his disposal and that, where necessary, he consults his colleagues.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): All right. You have said that it is the position of the government that the power to impose new taxes cannot be delegated by Parliament. Is that provision to be found in the Constitution Act, 1867, and, if so, where?

Mr. Snarr: That is my understanding, senator. Perhaps Mr. Molot can speak to this point.

Mr. Molot: I did not bring that act with me, but I believe this matter is covered in section 53 or section 54.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have a copy of the act here. Perhaps I could put it in your hands so that you can read the relevant section.

Mr. Molot: Section 53 states:

Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Then there is a procedure attached to that, in section 54, whereby that bill must be preceded by a recommendation of the Governor General. That has been taken to mean that all taxing measures must originate with a bill and that the bill must originate from the House of Commons.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Upon a recommendation, in the case of both appropriation and taxation?

Mr. Molot: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Is there jurisprudence on this point? Has it been decided by a court of relevant jurisdiction that Parliament cannot delegate the power to tax?

Mr. Molot: In theory, if there were an express provision in a bill delegating to the Governor in Council, for example, the power to impose tax or to set the rate of tax, that might lead to an arguable case that section 53 is being complied with.

Senator Frith: Yes, as long as the bill originated in the House of Commons.

Mr. Molot: That is right, and as long as the delegated power is expressed. But there is no power of this sort expressed in Bill C-77. I would assume that a court, not finding it there, would say that section 53 of the Constitution Act has not been complied with.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You say you would "assume".

Mr. Molot: Since I am not aware of a case, senator, I can only give my legal view that I do not think a court would agree that Bill C-77 has authorized delegated legislation to impose tax.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Do you know of any case, tried by a court of relevant jurisdiction, that has said that express words are necessary?

Mr. Molot: There may be one, but I am not aware of it.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, the government takes the position that, since there are no express words in this bill delegating the power to tax, that power is not being delegated?

Mr. Molot: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Are there any other powers of Parliament that it cannot delegate except by express words? We were told just now that the delegation, in the case of a war emergency, is of "the widest possible scope". I think those were the words used. Are there any other powers that are held back because they are not delegated in this bill by express words?

Mr. Snarr: One power came up several times during the discussion of the human rights implications of Bill C-77, and that was in relation to section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the so-called "notwithstanding clause". It was contended by one of the witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee in the House of Commons that the Governor in Council could, by order, invoke the provision of the "notwithstanding clause" and thereby set aside some of the basic rights that we all enjoy under the Charter.

Again, on the advice of legal counsel, the government is convinced, it is virtually certain, that any court would rule that such action was ultra vires, that no government would be so disrespectful of the laws of the country even to attempt such an action.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I know the point to which you refer. Perhaps it would be useful to the committee if you were to put on our record the words of subsection 33(1).

Mr. Snarr: Subsection 33(1) of the Charter reads:

Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

The operative words, of course, are "in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature".

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are saying, it is the government's position that, even by express words, Parliament could not delegate to the Governor in Council the right to exercise the "notwithstanding" power.

Mr. Snarr: That is correct.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Unfortunately, you used the words "the government is convinced" and "virtually certain", instead of "absolutely certain".

Mr. Snarr: One can only be absolutely certain in these matters when the situation has occurred and has been contested and ruled upon by the highest court of the land.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So you would be prepared to advise, for absolute certainty, that an amendment be made, provided, of course, that it did not take a great deal of time?

[Mr. Snarr.]

Mr. Snarr: I would certainly not recommend that there be an amendment for absolute certainty. The certainty is so great that an amendment is, in my view, completely unnecessary. Not only that, it would seem to me that whenever one introduces clauses in legislation, albeit for the meritorious objective of greater certainty, one is undermining, in effect, the related legislation or the related legal foundations on which the whole of our system is based. It brings into question that if one does not put in the "for greater certainty" clause in other legislation, it opens up a greater degree of uncertainty.

● (1510)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): My next line of questioning deals with the matter of setting aside the provisions of other statutes. Under this bill it will not be possible for the Governor in Council to put aside the provisions of this statute. That opens up the question of putting aside the provisions of other statutes. On May 31, 1988, Mr. Beatty appeared before us. At page 3541 of Debates of the Senate, Mr. Beatty said:

I am told that it might be possible in instances where it was directly relevant and necessary to deal with the emergency provided for under this statute.

I then comment:

So your answer is yes, by an order in council or a regulation made under this act, statutes enacted by Parliament could be set aside. You are asking for that power?

Are there any statutes, other than the one that would eventuate from Bill C-77, if it passes, that are exempt from the power that the government is seeking in the bill—the power to set aside provisions of acts of Parliament by orders in council?

Mr. Snarr: As far as I know, there is no legislation that could not be temporarily overridden, if it were necessary to do so, to meet the purposes of this legislation.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So this is really a super statute. There is the Constitution, then there is this statute and then there are all the other statutes, which are subordinate.

Mr. Snarr: The qualification that the order or regulation makes, insofar as it overrides other legislation, must be very narrowly confined to matters which are intended toward the purpose of the act, that is, dealing with the emergency. There is a considerable body of legislation which constrains the procedure under which this is done. I have in mind the Statutory Instruments Act, for example, which gives quite a degree of confinement as to what the government can do by order or regulation.

In my view, it would not be possible for the government, on the basis of Bill C-77, to enact a regulation which, in effect, undid the restrictions that were in the Statutory Instruments Act.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Are you saying that that would be legally impossible?

Mr. Snarr: That is my view, yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Is that the view of the government?

Mr. Molot: I think that is true, senator. That is given added support by the very fact that reference is made in the body of the bill to the Statutory Instruments Act. Therefore, it becomes a basic or fundamental part of the structure of Bill C-77. The same could be said for the Canadian Bill of Rights. Presumably that could not be "notwithstanding" by order.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You say "presumably".

Mr. Molot: Again, we have the preamble.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Nevertheless, this is really a super statute.

I come now to the question of grounds for internment. Although the minister made a great effort to be helpful on this subject, I am not sure that I, for one, understand exactly what would happen. There would be regulations such as the Defence of Canada Regulations. Under those regulations, let us say that an appropriate official makes an order for internment of a specified person. We are well down the genealogical tree from the emergency act itself.

What would happen in a court? The habeas corpus writ would be obtained. There would be counsel. Clearly, there would not be a trial on a charge, because there would be no charge. The person has been taken into custody, not because of something he or she has actually done that was contrary to the law but in anticipation that he or she might do something which would be damaging to the peace, order and good government of Canada. Therefore, there cannot be a trial on a charge.

The government of the day would be saying that they believe, they guess that it would be better if this person were put away for a while. The minister said that all facts would be disclosed. I wondered at the time if he had thought that through. At page 3532 of Debates of the Senate of May 31, 1988, I asked him:

The question is: Will the person who is challenging his own detention be able to require the government to disclose the facts on the basis of which the detention order against him had been made?

The minister replied:

To the court, yes.

What facts would be disclosed?

Mr. Snarr: Subject to further refinement from Mr. Molot, the situation would be that the principle of habeas corpus would be invoked and the government would be required to show cause why the individual should continue to be kept in custody. In order to do that, the government would have to demonstrate that keeping the individual in custody was consistent with the law. With all the protections that are available through the Charter and through the explicit protections in Bill C-77, the government would have to disclose enough information to the court to convince the judge that what he or she was doing was legal, that the Crown had reasonable grounds on which to take this action, and that the individual was not being detained on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): We all understand that it would have to be shown that the detention was consistent with the law. However, the law may well say that, if the minister believes someone is likely to commit an offence, that person may be detained. In that case the requirement that the detention be consistent with such a law would not mean very much.

I do not intend to ask my next question as a rhetorical question. It is not the judgment of the court as to whether the facts that the minister has available to him are adequate for the court to form a belief. It is simply that there are facts and that a reasonable person might, on the basis of those facts, form the belief that, in the particular case, the minister happened to form. Is that not the situation?

Mr. Snarr: Senator, that is precisely the situation. The only way a judge could determine the answer to the question you pose is to have those facts given to him so that he could decide whether a reasonable person would form the belief that it was necessary to incarcerate the individual.

• (1520)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I asked if the facts would be disclosed, not to the judge or the court but to the person.

Let me come at it this way. I am asking the witness if he is aware of situations which arose during the Second World War, where, for security reasons, it was impossible to tell persons interned why they were being interned. In other words, to inform them of the causes of their internment would be to violate state security. Are you aware of that problem? You have stated that, notwithstanding that, we will give these persons, who we believe are a threat to the security of Canada, information which may well be damaging to the security of Canada. Is that what your bill is doing?

Mr. Snarr: Certainly not; the bill is not doing that at all.

At the risk of repeating myself, the bill states that, if the matter is contested, the government must put that information in the hands of the judge.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So the minister was not quite responsive when he replied with a "yes" to my question, when I asked: "Will the person who is challenging his own detention be able to require the government to disclose the facts on the basis of which the detention against him had been made?"

Mr. Snarr: I think the minister was being quite specific and forthcoming in his reply that, yes, the government would be obliged to disclose the facts.

The disclosure must be sufficient, and sufficiently in accordance with accepted procedure to justify within our judicial system the individual's incarceration.

There is an additional Charter protection, as far as the individual is concerned, that states that everyone has the right on arrest or detention to be informed promptly of the reasons therefor. If the government wished to deny that information to the individual being held on security grounds, they would have the additional obligation to explain to the judge why it was reasonable and demonstrably justifiable, in a free and democratic society, that this information be withheld.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But you are conjuring up in my mind the image of a minister going to a judge and saying, "I believe he or she is a dangerous person and the reasons I happen to think this are such and such. I cannot say them in an open court, but these are the reasons."

Mr. Snarr: I can visualize situations in which that kind of process would be entirely justified.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is the answer that I was expecting. I had hoped that I would get it by a less circuitous route.

Mr. Snarr: It would be under extreme situations, and very unusual, and ones that one would expect to occur only in rare instances, even in the depths of a disastrous war.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman and Senator Stewart, would Senator Stewart allow me to pursue that point?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Please do.

Senator Frith: I wish to clarify something.

Listening to the exchange, the first question was that, assuming a person who is detained asks for a writ of habeas corpus, and on return of the writ before the judge the person asks for the facts, that immediately raises the question of ministerial discretion, and the Crown is right—not this minister, but any person who exercises the executive's right—to claim executive privilege for reasons of national security or otherwise. I think Duncan and Cammell-Laird is one of the leading older cases on this question.

I thought that what Senator Stewart was pursuing was: Is there anything in this bill that would change the right of the executive to claim privilege against disclosure? I then heard you say that the bill would require it. That is what triggered my curiosity. Is there something in this bill that deals with the question of executive discretion in those circumstances, other than the general law that enables the executive to claim this discretion and protection, and then limiting how far the court can go behind it?

Mr. Snarr: What is different in this bill from a lot of other legislation that gives the executive certain powers is the repetition throughout the bill, in every place where the Governor in Council is authorized to take exceptional actions, that the action must be reasonable and he must believe on reasonable grounds that it is necessary. So there is an objective test for everything that the executive does. That is tied up with the words "the Governor in Council believes on reasonable grounds—"

This is an important change that was made to the bill between first reading and eventual passage. In the original drafting of the legislation, in all those places where you see those words "believes on reasonable grounds", it said, "Where in the opinion of the Governor in Council it was necessary."

Senator Frith: Yes.

Mr. Snarr: This would be completely unchallengeable; there would be no test whatsoever.

Senator Frith: That is an answer. Thank you.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have one other question, which is a different kind. We know that the powers that will be exercised by the government under this bill, if it becomes a statute and its provisions are invoked, could well reach into areas which normally come under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

On the basis of the minister's answer, I assume that careful anticipation has been made; that a war book has been prepared; and that you have analyzed what areas of provincial legislation would come under the Governor in Council, although those areas would not come under the Parliament of Canada. What would some of the leading areas be? What would the principal areas be which would be taken over and cease to fall under our normal federal structure?

Mr. Snarr: It is difficult to generalize on that point. I might preface my response by saying that, depending on the situation, there is almost no area of provincial jurisdiction that might not need to be intervened in because of the exigencies of emergency.

The easiest way to describe the sort of things that might be necessary is to state that to meet the needs of a national emergency there could be a need to marshal the resources of the country as a whole towards that emergency, where resources and capabilities that exist in one province might have to be applied in another province or put together to be applied outside of the country in the case of war.

Looking at a domestic peacetime emergency, where the provinces may be perfectly willing—in fact, even desirous—to help out their fellow citizens in other provinces, there is not the legal or constitutional authority for them to requisition resources within their own province and apply them in other provinces. Federal authority would be the only one available.

• (1530)

One could give other examples, particularly in a war-time context. For example, matters having to do with the local management of the economy, which are generally left to the provinces—and here I am referring to things such as the distribution of the necessities of life. In times of war when these became scarce, in order to be fair throughout the country, it might be necessary to introduce federal measures which would impose or supersede the authority of the provinces in those areas.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Would it be possible, by order in council, to declare works to be of national importance? I have forgotten the exact subsection in section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 that permits Parliament to make works federal. Would it be possible to do that by order in council in a sufficiently great emergency?

Mr. Snarr: It would seem to me that it might be possible, but it would, in a sense, be superfluous. If the action of taking over some activity which was normally within provincial jurisdiction were necessary in order to meet the exigencies of a situation, then the federal government would only need to pass an order to that effect; it would not have to use the constitutional basis of declaring a federal work.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): There is a normal constitutional process. What I am asking you is if that normal process could be avoided by use of an order in council under the powers of this statute?

Mr. Snarr: Mr. Chairman, the advice I am given—and I must qualify it to be of the "off-the-top-of-the-head" variety, if Mr. Molot will permit me—is that to invoke the provision of the Charter that permits the federal government to declare certain undertakings or works as federal works and thereby bring them within the federal jurisdiction—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, it is not in the Charter; it is in the Constitution.

Mr. Snarr: I am sorry, it is in the Constitution—that it would require an act of Parliament to use that specific power. However, I would still maintain that, if the needs of the emergency were such that that was necessary, the federal government could still have the same effect through an order in council, pursuant to the Emergencies Act, without having to make reference to the constitutional provision.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): We were told by Mr. Beatty that extensive consultation had taken place with the government of each of the provinces, I believe. Was there, in fact, discovery on this point? In other words, did you notify Prince Edward Island, Quebec and British Columbia that, by order in council, it would be possible to take over works within provinces which would normally be under provincial jurisdiction? Was that question explored with them?

Mr. Snarr: I can assure honourable senators that, without any doubt whatsoever, the provinces were fully aware of the implications of Bill C-77 with regard to intervention into matters normally within their jurisdiction. That, in fact, was their primary concern in almost all of the discussions that took place, both at the level of officials and at the level of ministers. The provinces repeatedly wanted to be reassured about the limitations that would be put on the government through this bill so that such intervention into provincial affairs would only be done where it was absolutely necessary.

In fact, I may say that at some of the earlier discussions several of the provinces took exception to this and contested whether, in this day and age, such intervention was constitutionally possible. However, it only took a very few minutes of consultation with their own legal authorities to inform them that it certainly was possible and was, in fact, the basis of the emergency doctrine of the Constitution.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I have one remaining question. Is there legislation in the United Kingdom that is comparable to Part IV of this bill?

Mr. Snarr: No, there is not. The Defence of the Realm Act, which was passed by the United Kingdom on separate occasions, you might say, in relation to the two world wars, was subsequently repealed after each of the wars. However, they do have other legislation in place to deal with peacetime emergencies which is much briefer than Bill C-77. In some respects, it is not as comprehensive, since, being a unitary state, they do not have to be concerned with the federal-provincial implications, as we do. Also, I might say that in many instances they have not paid the same attention to detail with respect to the safeguards of individual rights and to detail with respect to the supervision of Parliament.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So you are saying that in the United Kingdom there is no parallel to Part IV of this bill and, in fact, no parallel to Part III. Is that right?

Mr. Snarr: As I say, there is certainly no parallel to Part IV. However, I am not sure, just on the basis of memory, of the extent to which their emergency legislation would permit them to take preparatory action in a national crisis, which is the intent of Part III.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Next on my list I have Senator Frith and he will be followed by Senator Marsden.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, the questions I had have been canvassed by Senator Stewart and by the witness. I will therefore yield to Senator Marsden.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if it is fair to assume that the witnesses read the transcripts of our exchange with the minister and therefore have read the questions which I put to Mr. Beatty, when he came before us the other day, concerning the public welfare emergency section. Is that a fair assumption?

Mr. Snarr: If you recall, senator, we were present.

Senator Marsden: My apologies. I would like to go back to that question, if I may, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to refer specifically to the question of internment. I may just be missing something here, but, under the orders and regulations section of the bill, clause 8(1) states that in a public welfare emergency the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations with respect to the establishment of emergency shelters and hospitals; evacuate people; regulate or prohibit their travel; take away or dispose of their property, et cetera.

What is the difference between that and internment, which the minister said was not possible under a public welfare emergency?

Mr. Snarr: Once an individual has been interned, we generally envisage a situation in which he has been put in a very restrictive and confined environment and is not allowed to stray therefrom for any purpose whatsoever. The kind of provisions that are envisaged in clause 8 for a public welfare emergency are designed to provide for the safety of individuals and are therefore more what one might call the "inverse of internment". There are areas from which people would be excluded, but, aside from that, they could roam wherever they pleased.

Senator Marsden: May I then ask if the witness is saying that that is what clause 8(1)(a) means when it says:

(a) the regulation or prohibition of travel to, from or within any specified area where necessary . . .

It sounds to me as though such people might be quite confined. Perhaps another way of asking the question is this: Is "internment" defined somewhere in this bill or in some other act where I might look?

● (1540)

Mr. Snarr: Senator, to answer your second question first, the word "internment" is not defined in this legislation and, to my knowledge, I do not think it is defined elsewhere. I can see your concern, particularly with regard to the word "from" in the phrase "the regulation or prohibition of travel . . . from . . . any specified area where necessary for the protection of the health or safety of individuals." One ought to keep in mind in considering the implications of that clause that we are talking, first, about a natural disaster or major accident. It is simply a temporary situation and the power to invoke measures pursuant to clause 8 are restricted to a relatively short timeframe. The measures must be very strictly confined to those that are necessary in order to meet the purposes of the act, which, in this particular clause, is "for the protection of the health or safety of individuals." The example that comes immediately to mind with regard to the prohibition on travel from a specified area is one where there is the necessity to quarantine certain individuals who are suffering from a highly contagious disease, both for their safety and for the safety of others. It may be necessary to confine them while they are in the condition where the disease is communicable. This, however, is not the least bit exceptional. I would not be surprised if there is sufficient authority within legislation with regard to the Department of National Health and Welfare or at the provincial level to take the kind of measures necessary to meet that situation, and therefore this legislation would not even need to be invoked for that purpose.

Senator Marsden: In the example that is offered, no doubt you are quite correct. Of course, the provision requires that the internment can be no longer than seven sitting days before it has to be reviewed. As you know, one has to try to think of extreme circumstances to determine how much protection the bill will provide. I come back to the question of why the minister would have replied that there is no power of internment, when, for at least seven days and perhaps longer, people may be confined to an emergency shelter, which, I suppose, could be called an internment camp under certain circumstances, and may not move "to, from or within" an area. What is the difference? I do not see the difference between that phrase and internment.

[Mr. Snarr.]

Mr. Snarr: The difference relates to the purpose for which the restrictions are being applied and, indeed, with regard to the specific nature of the restrictions. I do not have a dictionary with me so I do not know what the generally accepted dictionary definition of "internment" is. It conjures up in my mind, as I am sure it does in the minds of many people, rather arbitrary confinement in a prison-like environment, where the concern is not so much with the safety of the individual as it is with what that individual might wilfully do to other people or what damage the individual might wilfully do to the rest of the country. It conjures up in my mind something very similar to imprisonment, detainment and so on.

Coming back to the example I used, when we talk about quarantine, we do not use the word "internment".

Senator Marsden: Recently I have had occasion to look at provincial legislation on this matter and it varies considerably from province to province. One can easily imagine where the federal government might wish to step into a situation involving disease. Many provinces have the power to deal with such incidents and some have power which may or may not be adequate, so this provision may have to apply in some future case.

The witness has described what this provision conjures up in his mind. It conjures up in my mind something entirely different. I can think of conditions in modern life where people might be declared insane or, for example, where some post-World War II condition might apply, and one can see the possibility of confinement for seven days. What kind of protection would those people or their relatives have if the people so confined could not move within the specified area, could not have contact with one another and they could not travel in or out? What kind of protection does this act provide within that seven-day period, before the House of Commons comes to their rescue?

Mr. Snarr: On your first point, the emphasis in paragraph 8(1)(a) ought to be placed on prohibition of travel. In other words, the power is not given to detain or to intern but to prohibit travelling, which has a slightly different connotation. I can see that you could interpret it in such a way as to mean travel within, for example, a 30-square-foot area, but I think the word "travel" connotes something more than that, and that therefore what you have described would not likely be permitted under paragraph 8(1)(a).

On your second question, there is, of course, the Charter rights which prevent people from being arbitrarily detained. Everyone has the right upon detention to be informed, and there are the legal rights which apply to everyone. If the order were worded in such a way as to confine travel significantly enough, then it would not take much imagination to conclude that that means detainment, and therefore the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would be triggered.

Senator Marsden: Thank you.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I have no other names on my list at this time. Therefore, on behalf of the committee, I thank the witnesses for coming here today.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1550)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): moved that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Cogger).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Cogger did intend to speak to this order today, but he had to leave to attend a committee meeting. He will be ready to proceed either tomorrow or on Tuesday next.

Order stands.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (drought conditions in Western Canada), presented in the Senate on 31st May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Fairbairn).

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before returning to western Canada and the drought area, I wanted to take part in this debate to comment on the report which our committee placed before this chamber a week ago.

Two weeks ago the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry heard from the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Wise, after this house agreed that there was a sufficient emergency situation to enable us to carry on a special study on the drought and to make recommendations.

I should like to recall what the minister said to us when he appeared before our committee two weeks ago. At that time he was discussing what might happen if the existing weather conditions continued in the prairie region. Mr. Wise said:

If this develops, following logic and common sense, we would first move water through pumps and pipes; then there would be the movement of livestock. We would have to deal with the herd sell-down. We would have to deal with herd movement and with forage movement; we would have to make some adjustments in crop insurance; we would have to work in the interests of good soil conservation, and then we would probably have to base the bottom line, as far as losses are concerned, upon crop losses . . . We are going to have to deal with all of these various phases if we do not get a good rainfall.

Mr. Wise concluded by saying the following:

I cannot tell anybody what the bottom line is going to be. If the drought develops, we will have to put in place a costly program, but we are going to have to be there.

Honourable senators, those comments were made two weeks ago, and I enter this discussion to say, with as strong a conviction as I can, that now is the time for the government to be there for the farmers in western Canada.

Last week Mr. Wise and the Ministers of Agriculture of the prairie provinces met in Calgary to consider the situation. They made two announcements which would be of assistance to the farmers. One was related to assistance by way of new water-supply works, such as wells, pipelines, dugouts and tank-loading facilities. These are projects that are carried out over a period of time.

The other announcement they made—and it relates to something which many of us have urged—was that provincial crop insurance boards would allow fall seeded crops to be immediately utilized as pasture or green feed for cattle. This, too, was a welcome announcement.

However, the minister stopped at that point and said that they were waiting for a further signal from the farm community before going into what the minister called “Phase II” in government assistance to the drought area.

Honourable senators, one needs only to fly across western Canada to know that Phase II is more than just upon us. Looking out of the window of an aircraft one is now seeing not pasture land, not prairie farms, one is now seeing virtually desert.

[Senator Doody.]

The farmers all across the prairie area have had no relief in the last two weeks in terms of rainfall. They have had a little here and a little there, which is just enough to settle the dust. In some cases the land is so dry and so hard that the water simply runs off and is not absorbed in order to permit growth.

In my province of Alberta, 60 per cent of net farm income comes from the livestock industry. In talking to farmers from Alberta this morning I am given to understand that the price of feed is adding a tremendous burden to their already shaky financial position. I am told that barley has been going up to the tune of five cents a bushel a day and that it has doubled in price in the last six weeks. The price of hay to the farmer in my area has tripled.

The cow-calf pairs, which form the absolute heart of the basic herd for livestock producers, are already starting to be sold, although perhaps not in great numbers, because farmers are waiting, hopefully, for a couple of more weeks so that their calves will be stronger and in better shape to face a buyer's market.

In terms of seeding crops, we are looking at one more week before farmers start running out of frost-free days. Germination in western Canada is already extremely spotty. Some estimates suggest that we are looking at a reduction of as much as 50 per cent in terms of our wheat crop this growing year. Farmers are asking that screenings from the grain shipments at the ports of Thunder Bay and Vancouver be turned around and that the government allow the Crow rate to apply to moving those screenings back to the prairies so they can be used to feed the cattle.

Honourable senators, one must remember that, before the drought, farmers all across the west were staggering under the burden of debt and financial strain brought about by issues well beyond their control in the international market through the subsidy wars between Europe and the United States. On top of that financial stress comes the drought, and now a third element, a final blow—what they are calling out in the west “a depression Thursday”—the day each week that interest rates are rising and taking away from the farmers any tiny quantum of hope they might have had of meeting their financial obligations.

● (1600)

Finally, if you put all of this together, there is the hidden problem that even farmers do not wish to talk about, and that is the personal stress and hardship placed on the lives of farmers and on the lives of their families. Community support services all across the prairies are meeting day and night to deal with suicide calls and to try to reach out to help farm families involved in this emotional situation.

All of this, honourable senators, leads me to conclude—and all of us must conclude—that, even if we have a complete turnabout in the weather, western Canada will still face a fearful depression in the months ahead.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry's report asks the government for transportation assistance to pay a portion of the cost of transporting forage to drought affected areas. The farmers need that now.

The report asks for transportation assistance to pay a portion of the cost of moving livestock to and from any available grazing areas. The farmers need that now.

The committee report asks for assistance to pay a portion of the cost of transporting water—hauling water—to areas affected by the drought. The farmers need that now.

Finally, the committee report asks the government to consider a special deferred income tax arrangement for farmers who have been forced to sell off their livestock inventory under these conditions. The farmers need that encouragement from the government now in order to plan for their future.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, that the eighth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be adopted in order to give tangible evidence of persuasion on behalf of our farmers for the government to make its next move immediately.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifty-fourth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget of Ad Hoc Committee on Senators' Research Expenditures), presented on Tuesday, June 7, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

"SOME OF MY BEST FRIENDS DIDN'T LOOK LIKE ME"

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 7, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the question "some of my best friends didn't look like me."

He said: Honourable senators, this is about those friends of mine who do not look like me. One who might be a friend, if I knew him, bears the difficult name of Dimitrios Papavramides. Believe it or not, he is the President of the Ontario Orange Lodge—multiculturalism is wonderful!

This gentleman has proposed in public that only WASPs—White Anglo-Saxon Protestants—be allowed into this country as immigrants. Well, if I met him I would have to tell him that we would not get any immigrants, because in the 59 countries I have visited all I found were Romans, all of whom were saying to me, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do."

That is what I tried to do. I observed some Romans and found that they enjoyed wine, women, song and even dancing.

I tried all four and acquired four inferiority complexes I did not have before.

Senator Corbin: Some of them were eaten by the lions!

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

I gesticulate, as Romans do, and on one occasion, while with Senator Petten and Senator Graham, I was gesticulating when Senator Graham said: "What would happen if you Greeks could not gesticulate any more?" I answered: "Do you think the ladies would like it?", and he blushed and left, which explains why I get into so much trouble.

Senator Frith: It does, indeed!

Senator Gigantès: I was advised by all of the Romans I met in all parts of the world to be meek and not to blow my own horn. They did not add, but they let it be quite clearly understood, that they wanted me to blow theirs, just as the bankers very properly hired Mr. MacPherson to blow their horns for them.

Senator Barootes: You have the wrong name. It is "MacIntosh".

Senator Gigantès: Well, we Greeks get mixed up with all of these Scottish names. On the small island I come from, when I was small and going there on summer vacations, people told me that I should never trust the Campbells. I did not know to which Campbells they were referring—Senator Barootes: Did you say "Campbells" or "Tamils"?

Senator Gigantès: Campbells. One Scottish lady had gone there two centuries earlier. She was a MacDonald. She had told the islanders that the Campbells were not to be trusted. Lo and behold, this small Greek island did not trust the Campbells, without knowing why.

Senator Phillips: Was that Flora MacDonald?

Senator Gigantès: No, but she would have been welcomed. We like redheads in Greece.

So I went from one place to another and I found that my behaviour would be considered eccentric, but, for instance, in England the behaviour of a well-known Colonel Wintel was not considered eccentric. A solicitor had done his family out of some inheritance and Colonel Wintel, a renowned commando, took the trousers off this solicitor and flew them from the masthead of Wintel Castle. This was applauded in Britain as being very suitable. Imagine the response if I had done that or if a Pakistani had done that.

Senator Frith: The life of a solicitor can be difficult!

Senator Gigantès: Yes. I remember going to a small village in India as a correspondent. There I saw a young man riding a white horse, and there was great anger all around because he was an Untouchable. He was not allowed to show off on a white horse. Only the other caste, the Brahmans, were allowed to do that. He was stoned to death before my very eyes. I was restrained from helping him, and the policeman who was present, to whom I protested that murder was being committed, said, "What murder?" He could not see it. Honourable senators, only some people have the right to show off.

Then there is the question of names. One of my honourable colleagues, whom I much admire and whose wit and intelligence is second to none, asked me one day whether "Deane Gigantès" was hyphenated. Well, one would have had to have mingled with Anglo-Saxons to know about this hyphenation ritual. I assured him that it was not. Honourable senators, there is a long story attached to this strange name of mine. I used to be called "Gigantès" when I was working for the London Observer. Someone there said to me, "You know, old chap, your name does have a classical ring to it, but we can't expect the ladies and gentlemen who read our paper to get their tongues around it, so I think we shall call you Philippe Deane hereafter—hah." And so I became "Philippe Deane".

Hon. David Walker: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening—and we all have—to complete irrelevancies.

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon?

Senator Walker: The honourable senator is talking through his hat. He hasn't said a sensible thing since he got to his feet, and I object to it. We put up with this man year after year, whenever he feels he has enough nerve to go on. It is just a lot of nonsense from beginning to end, and so it has been today. Mr. Speaker, I am respectfully suggesting that he either sit down or, when he gets up next, that he be sensible and relevant.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, this is an illustration of some of the things I have been trying to convey. What is sensible and relevant to some is not sensible and relevant to others. And, of course, the longer you have a right somewhere, the more you write to establish the rules about being sensible.

Senator Walker: That was a smart answer.

Senator Gigantès: It was a Scot, Macbeth, who said, about those he did not consider sensible, but would tolerate, nonetheless:

Ourself will mingle with society,
And play the humble host.

I am sure that Senator Walker would be perfectly capable of doing that. I have been given all sorts of other advice by Senator Walker on previous occasions. He has always told me that the squeaky wheel is the one that gets the grease—provided, of course, that the person speaking was the squeaky wheel and that I provided the grease.

Senator Walker: You have always been a greasy wheel and you are always irrelevant. Mr. Speaker, we are all here waiting for something to help us through our business. Senator Gigantès has said nothing yet that is relevant. I respectfully suggest that he take his seat and that he think over something he might say in the future that has some sense to it. But if he is going to continue in this way, I suggest that we have a motion to have him stopped.

Senator Olson: No—

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: If, of course, one conforms to one's surroundings and behaves exactly as Senator Walker would have me behave—out of character—one becomes like this good Mr. Dimitrios Papavramides, who inhabits a part of Ontario where there are a lot of members of the Orange Lodge. In trying to please them he made himself utterly ridiculous.

I have met these Romans everywhere, but I have found that, when they get past the stage of trying to give advice, they are particularly nice. There was one in Korea whom I did not like at all. When I was wounded, and both he and I had our hands tied behind our backs, he would suck the pus out of my wound. Tex Kimball—I remember him well. He was racist, but he was a very nice man.

I also remember a Canadian Air Force officer who was another member of the Orange Lodge. He thought the French should not really exist—not in Canada. But when the girl to whom he was engaged lost her leg in the Blitz, he married her, nevertheless. He was a very fine man.

I remember a lady in India, Mrs. Shri Krishna, who was a Brahman. Of course, not being Indian, I was Untouchable, according to her religion. Nevertheless, she would pick up my small daughter, play with her, and afterwards submit herself to ceremonies of purification. She picked up my daughter as an act of courtesy and kindness, and for that I am grateful to her, despite her strange views.

Honourable senators, I am immodestly proud of having reached the stage where I can like people, even though they may think that I do not act as they think I should or as they do. That is part of being adopted. And the Canadian family has adopted me. I would rather be an adopted child of the Canadian family than a child of the blood of any other family. And I like Canadians, Senator Walker included—he is second to none in my affections. Senator Flynn is another one I like a great deal. We went on a trip together and I found him wonderful. If they take an occasional shot at me, well, I can only say that I have learned another British rule—one of the Queensberry rules—when they hit you in the mouth, you should hit them right back. Then afterwards, if they have the character of Senator Phillips, who has just walked out, everything is over and people can be friends. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have to inform the Senate that Senator Murray will not be with us today. I believe he is in Fredericton on public business.

Senator Steuart: Dishing out goodies!

MOSCOW SUMMIT, 1988

CONGRATULATIONS TO SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS ON APPRAISAL OF MEETING AND TO UNITED STATES AND SOVIET LEADERS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, would the genial deputy leader, who is very adept at language and an expert in communication, communicate—

Senator Doody: Are you talking about Senator Frith?

Senator Macquarrie: I am speaking of our deputy leader, although Senator Frith is not bad either. Would the deputy leader communicate to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—and I would not presume to speak on behalf of my colleagues here, so it must be my own—my feeling of appreciation for the excellent way in which he gave an appraisal of the summit meeting in Moscow, an event which has not yet been discussed in this place? Could he convey to him the view that it is very wise and expedient, hopeful and positive to congratulate the two leaders of the superpowers of the world, who, by an ill-advised and inadvertent act, could destroy the whole world? I believe they should be commended for spending days together, having reasonable dialogue.

I think we should not be afraid, whether we are right-wingers, as I am not, or left-wingers, as I am, to rejoice in the fact that they have in the Soviet Union the most positive and progressive member of the top brass in that country in my time—and that is a hell of a long time, as human beings exist. I, who am not known as a right-winger and was never a great enthusiast for Ronald Reagan, must say that he performed in the right way at the right time. Perhaps all of us may derive some benefit from the restrained wisdom of these two people. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs, in my judgment, conveyed that, praised that and spoke about it with the kind of judgment that a good Canadian statesman should.

If I am making too long a preamble to my question, I know it, I like it and I rarely indulge it. I am not one of those who ever rejoice when someone brings up points of order or precedents, because I think the Senate is at its best when it is pragmatic. The less we have of Bourinot and Sir Erskine May in this place of sedate, sober second thought, in my opinion, the better.

I recall the time, when I was more active in the national party caucus, when Robert Stanfield, our greatest leader and our leader at that time, was being accused by someone—I will not give his name because that would be a breach of caucus—of going along with Trudeau's so-called soft view towards the Soviet Union. Mr. Stanfield said, "Whatever you may think of Mr. Trudeau, or however you appraise his motives, there is no way that this party that I lead will be seen to be against détente." We now call it—we are more modern—perestroika and glasnost, but I think the same situation prevails. I cannot see how any Canadian who loves peace, his country and the serenity of the world could not but rejoice in that summit, despite those who say, "Oh, it is all propaganda and over-reaction." In the long run, is it not a great thing to have these two masters of these great states converse and dialogue?

Therefore, I ask in a word, in my brief way, if our deputy leader would convey that view to our Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be most pleased to!

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Ethel Cochrane moved the second reading of Bill C-115, to amend the Indian Act (designated lands).

She said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak in support of Bill C-115, to amend the Indian Act, also known as the Kamloops amendment.

As honourable senators know, this bill has received the support of all parties in the House of Commons. This bill has a special significance in that the Indian Act has been brought forward for amendment at the request of the Indian people. This is the first ever Indian-led change to the Indian Act. These amendments were initiated by one band, the Kamloops Band in British Columbia, in January of 1985. The band received direct support for its proposal from over 100 bands across the country.

● (1410)

In 1986 the General Assembly of the Assembly of First Nations also endorsed the Kamloops Band's proposal. The Chief of the Kamloops Band, Chief Manny Jules—a well-known personality, I might add—has travelled extensively throughout the country, explaining his proposal at various meetings. Indian people understood what he was proposing and supported him.

In May 1988 the Assembly of First Nations examined Bill C-115 and endorsed it, requesting only one minor change. That change has been incorporated in the bill I am presenting today, and I hope my honourable colleagues will now provide their support.

As has been stated on other occasions, so long as the Indian Act is with us, we should make the act work for Indian people. Whatever gains we make in that way will provide benefits.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Honourable senators, the bill before us today has a two-fold objective: first, it will clarify the legal status of Indian land; second, it will establish the legal foundation for property taxation by band councils. On the first point, the bill replaces the term "surrender" with a new concept called "designation". Designation will allow bands to set land aside for leasing and for the purpose of economic development, without the land losing its reserve status.

As honourable senators know, land is the most vital and sacred concern of Indian people. Indian people must control their own lands and those lands must be legally disposed of so that maximum control and economic benefits are provided to Indian communities. Leasing to both Indians and non-Indians is one of the primary means by which Indian bands can benefit economically from their lands and create revenues that can be reinvested for further development of the community.

Some councils may decide not to use their land in this manner, and that is their choice. However, other bands do wish to use their land as a source of profit and employment for their community. We must respect this point of view and make it possible for them to do so. The great advantage to leasing arrangements is that the underlying Indian interest in the land is retained and the land keeps its reserve status. At the same time, the lease provides the legal basis for the economic use of the land.

The Indian Act does not allow bands to lease their land directly. The act states that the land must first be surrendered to the Crown, which is then authorized to enter into the lease on behalf of the band. This process is both slow and complicated. However, it has historical roots that touch on the basic nature of the relationship between the Crown, the Indian people and Indian lands.

In this amendment to the Indian Act, Indian leaders have not asked that the surrender process be changed or removed. That action may come in the future, but only after much consideration has been given to the consequences for the Indian-Crown relationship.

Within the present context of the surrender process, however, an extremely important distinction needs to be made between an absolute surrender of land for sale and a surrender for lease. At the moment, that difference is mentioned in only one line of the Indian Act and it is not clearly explained. That is a source of serious confusion that must be addressed.

The bill before you establishes that a surrender may take one of two forms: first, an absolute surrender for sale, which removes land completely of all Indian interests and takes it out of the reserve. That is extremely rare. The second form is a surrender for lease or for some other restricted purpose. In this case the land remains part of the reserve. This is an important distinction to make. Setting aside part of a reserve for leasing does not mean a release of the Indian interest in the land. As I mentioned earlier, in order to facilitate and strengthen the distinction between these two types of surrender, land surrendered for lease will be known as "designated land" and the process of such non-absolute surrender will be termed "designation."

Other rights obtained through the Indian Act will continue to apply, such as voting rights in band elections or protection of cultural property. The power to govern the land through band bylaws is another extremely important point. At the moment it is not clear in the Indian Act if the word "reserve" includes surrendered land. It is therefore possible that, when land is surrendered for lease, it will cease to be defined as part of the reserve. That is totally unacceptable and denies Indian jurisdiction and control of Indian land. It also creates a very serious vacuum of local jurisdiction over leased Indian land. That situation must not continue.

One of the most important bylaw powers that bands require for local government and economic independence is their power to tax the use of land. This leads to the second purpose of these amendments, which is to establish clearly that band councils have the power to tax any interest or use of reserve lands in order to defray their costs as governments. Such a taxation power is an obvious element in all forms of modern government. As I said previously, some bands may wish not to use this power. However, it must be made available to those who want to exercise it.

Since 1951 section 83 of the Indian Act has provided a taxation power for band councils. It is possible, however, that the power applies only to Indians. As presently worded, it may not apply to non-Indian leaseholders. The amendments proposed in Bill C-115 will ensure that non-Indians are covered.

Section 83 of the Indian Act is also being modified in another aspect. Bands will no longer need to be declared to have reached an advanced stage of development before they may pass money bylaws. The enforcement powers that band councils require for their tax systems will be strengthened and taxation bylaws will have to include appeal procedures to ensure equity for taxpayers.

A general federal regulatory power is provided. Although no regulations are proposed at this time, the purpose of any future regulations would be to minimize ministerial discretion in respect of the exercise of band powers. If rules are necessary, they should be explicit and objective.

Certain sections of the Indian Act create exclusively Indian land holdings in reserves in which non-Indians cannot participate. The word "reserve" cannot include "designated land" for the purposes of these sections, since designated land is designed to include non-Indian participation.

● (1420)

These sections are enumerated in a new definition of "reserve". In this context, section 89 of the act creates a special consideration. Section 89 protects Indian real and personal property on a reserve from any form of seizure or mortgage. It is a mixed blessing for Indian people. On the one hand it protects their property, but on the other hand it prevents them from offering security for loans.

The question arises as to how the concept of designated land should apply to section 89; after all, the purpose of such land is to allow leasehold interests to enter the legal and economic mainstream while protecting the underlying Indian interest in the land. With this in mind, it is proposed to amend section 89 so that leasehold interests in designated land will be made mortgageable. This would mean that an Indian person holding a lease on designated land would be able, just as a non-Indian is, to use the land as security for a loan. There would be no risk to the ultimate reserve status of the land or any possible loss of the ultimate Indian interest. Only the lease would be at risk. Of course, such leasehold interests would also remain under band council jurisdiction. This change should be a major breakthrough for Indian economic use of and benefit from reserve land. In other words, individual Indians will, for the first time, be able to use leases of Indian lands as collateral for investment.

Proponents of amendment to the Indian Act usually suggest that we do away with it completely or that we amend every section, but in this case a limited change to the act has been proposed by Chief Jules, with the support of the Indian community at large.

I would remind honourable senators that last fall they received copies of an information booklet explaining the proposed amendments in detail, as did all provincial governments and major associations of municipalities. Every Indian band also received two separate mailings of the booklet.

Finally, I should like to draw to your attention the need for an amendment to correct a minor error in the bill as passed by the House of Commons. Clause 10 at line 31, page 6 of the bill, reads:

... regulations not consistent with this section

The bill should, in fact, read:

... regulations not inconsistent with this section

Honourable senators, this was merely a typographical error, and I shall be moving an amendment to clause 10 during clause-by-clause consideration of the bill in order to correct it. We will then have to send the bill back to the other place for their concurrence.

In conclusion, I wish to point out that this bill constitutes yet another indication of this government's commitment to deal effectively with matters of concern to our native people in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, at the outset I would like to thank Senator Cochrane for the most useful explanation she gave relating to Bill C-115. I also want to indicate that I, personally, support these amendments and that the Liberal Party of Canada supports these amendments. Many of these amendments are quite welcome.

Movement from the use of the word "surrender" to the term "designated lands" is welcome. Indians have been unhappy with the word "surrender" for a long time now. In some ways it was not bad, but in other ways it was bad. In one way the band membership never did really lose control. In order to surrender land there had to be either a vote or votes by the band in order to approve the surrender. From that point of view, the band and the band council did not lose control.

But there were other problems. Certainly, there was the perception problem. Imagine having to "surrender" your own land! Just the very thought of using the word "surrender" had Indians up in arms. There was also a real problem as to the status of the land once it was surrendered and leased. It was always the contention of Indians that the surrendered and leased reserve land was still reserve land, but there was some doubt concerning taxation. There was no doubt about the ability of a province to tax a leasehold interest on Indian lands, but there was some doubt as to the ability of the band government to levy taxes on its own land. That was unacceptable. The bill clarifies that and that is welcome.

Bill C-115 changes the language from "surrendered lands" to "designated lands". That is good. It also clarifies the unquestioned authority of a band government to tax leasehold interests on designated lands, and that is good.

Even though this bill makes some much needed amendments to the Indian Act for the benefit of bands that have large tracts of leased lands, I wish it had gone further on the question of taxation. I would, in particular, like to see provincial governments totally excluded from the right to levy any taxes on reserve lands.

The Government of British Columbia, most particularly, has not had a good record in the way it has taxed leasehold interests on Indian reserves in the past. It is generally accepted that, if a government levies taxes, it should provide to those paying the taxes something in the way of services. In the case of the Government of British Columbia, it has taxed substantial leasehold interests on the Kamloops Indian Reserve for many years without giving one penny back. The Kamloops Indian Band had to build roads, put in a water system and so forth from its own meagre resources on its subdivisions of leased lands, and that was grossly unfair to the Kamloops Indian Band.

I happened to glance through the publication circulated by the minister, which Senator Cochrane mentioned in her remarks. At page 4 of that publication there is mention of "relationships with other jurisdictions" and "provinces permitting taxation on Indian lands". The following statement appears:

In British Columbia it is uniform practice to assess and tax the real property interests of non-Indians on Indian land. In Quebec and the Atlantic provinces such taxation is not prohibited, but it is relatively rare.

In the 1970s the prairie provinces and Ontario vacated the field of property taxation of non-Indians on Indian lands. I believe the Province of Saskatchewan and the Province of Ontario took the lead in that regard. That was a very welcome move, because in some cases substantial taxes had been collected without one penny being returned. That was totally unacceptable. In this regard, the Province of British Columbia has been an offender for a long period of time. It is not just the Kamloops Indian Band that has been affected; other bands have been as well, such as the Sechelt Band, the Musqueam Band and the Capilano Band, in fact, any band in the province of British Columbia that has leasehold land for development purposes.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to prolong consideration of this bill at this stage. However, I would like to see it referred to the appropriate committee so that we can have it explained further by the minister or his officials. I note that Senator Cochrane wishes to move an amendment. Perhaps we could do that sometime next week. I will certainly cooperate in moving it along quickly, because I know that a number of bands—especially those in British Columbia with leasehold development property—are anxious that these changes be made as quickly as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I believe the proper procedure to follow is to send this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I have been in touch with Senator Neiman and she has agreed to that, and acknowledges the urgency of the matter.

I move that Bill C-115 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps we should just note for the record that "Indian and Inuit affairs" is one of the subjects assigned to the mandate of the committee chaired by Senator Tremblay. Of course, with leave or unanimous consent, we can send it to any committee we wish.

After listening to the explanations of Senator Cochrane and Senator Marchand, it seems clear to me that the pith and substance of the bill is legal. It deals with surrender, leaseholds, mortgaging leaseholds and taxing leaseholds. For that reason I think we should give unanimous consent to having it go to the committee referred to.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with everything that Senator Frith has said, with the exception of the word "pith".

Senator Frith: There is nothing wrong with the word, as long as you pronounce it carefully.

On motion of Senator Cochrane, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

[Senator Marchand.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Cogger).

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, lest I be thought of as trying to delay unduly the progress of this important matter, I have decided to interrupt abruptly my extensive research on this subject and, after pithy questions by Senator Frith, Senator Hicks and Senator Bonnell, indeed, I have decided to try to address this important subject. Senators will allow me to speak briefly, because my researchers have not completed the remarks I wished to convey to the Senate, but I will do my best.

Senator Doody: That sounds like a $30,000 project.

Senator Frith: You are speaking half prepared.

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: Honourable senators, those of us who are graduates of Senator Bonnell's school of hard knocks are celebrating a first anniversary this year. I am thinking of my colleagues, Senators David and Buckwold, and Senator Thériault, who is not with us today. A year ago around this time, we were somewhere between Charlottetown and Regina, considering Bill C-22.

As Senator Bonnell was wont to say to whomever cared to listen, the committee went on the road because if Mohammed wouldn't go to the mountain, the mountain would go to Mohammed. After travelling all summer and examining the bill, the committee produced its report. Finally, Bill C-22 was adopted at the end of last fall.

Senator Bonnell, however, refused to give up. We all know the senator did not entirely agree with Bill C-22, with or without amendments, and so now Senator Bonnell moves that we adopt Bill S-15. This bill is—I was going to say his revenge, but I take that back!—an attempt to do what he failed to accomplish through C-22.

Honourable senators, I submit, with respect, that Bill S-15 is as premature as Bill C-22 was long in coming. Bill C-22 had been eagerly awaited by Canadian researchers, by the drug companies and by many health agencies in the medical world. Its passage was delayed because of all the political manoeuvring we were exposed to a year ago at this time.

Bill C-22, adopted in the fall of 1987, provided for the establishment of the Drug Prices Review Board and set up special mechanisms which the government, in its wisdom, had designed to protect the consumer. After Bill C-22 saw the light of day at the end of 1987, Senator Bonnell, who deserves first prize for constant perseverance, was on the barricades again.

[English]

Senator Buckwold: And intelligence.

Senator Cogger: I do not question that, sir, but judgment is a different story, Senator Buckwold.

[Translation]

Senator Bonnell came back with a bill whose drastic effects would include virtually depriving the Drug Prices Review Board, chaired by Dr. Eastman, of its powers—

[English]

Senator Haidasz: They have not done anything else.

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: Excuse me, Senator Haidasz, if you will allow me, you can speak later. So I was saying that he is trying to strip it of its powers.

Dr. Eastman has barely begun his work; he has enormous powers that the government has given him—

[English]

Senator Buckwold: Seven months late!

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: He has a heavy responsibility and before he even has the chance to exercise it properly, before he has a few months of experience, Senator Bonnell wants to put him in a straitjacket. He wants to impose such strict, inflexible, untenable rules on him that they would end up taking the Prices Review Board out of Bill C-22. This board is one of the most important safeguards for consumers.

On our long journey across the country, we heard all the consumers and organizations that wanted to share their concerns with us. Senator Bonnell will agree with me that one of the things we kept on hearing was, "For heaven's sake, give the board chaired by Dr. Eastman all the powers for adequate protection."

Honourable senators, I submit to you in my humble opinion that the passage of Bill C-22 was unduly delayed for nearly eight months and this was, I think, a mistake. Honourable senators, I also submit to you that to go through the same debate on Bill S-15 now or shortly after the adoption of C-22 would compound the original mistake and undo the long effort spent in the first debate.

● (1440)

[English]

I must apologize, honourable senators, to Senator Turner. When I mentioned Senator Bonnell's committee's pilgrimage of last year, I omitted to mention that my good friend and colleague, Senator Turner, survived it all with good grace and, with us, listened carefully to everybody.

Senator Turner: What about the drug prices?

Senator Cogger: Let me come to the drug prices. It is interesting that the honourable senator should mention them. It is also interesting to note that one of the points in support of Bill S-15, as I understand it, is a study that was conducted by two pharmacists at the request, I believe, of Senator Haidasz. Honourable senators, I have read that study; I have looked at its conclusions and I am not impressed. I do not know anything about the sampling that was done, nor do I know anything about the rigorous scientific methodology used to look at such important matters, but, personally, and with all due respect to the people who conducted the study, I would sooner rely on another study recently conducted by the firm of Peat Marwick. Honourable senators, I do not have to describe that firm—everybody knows it—and I do not think anyone would question its methodology.

Senator Buckwold: That study was paid for by whom?

Senator Haidasz: Who paid for the study?

Senator Cogger: And that study says—

Senator Haidasz: How much did they get paid?

Senator Cogger: Isn't it terrible that they got paid for their study? They are, sir, professional consultants, and I wouldn't mind relying on them.

Senator Steuart: I wouldn't mind being one of them!

Senator Cogger: This is a study conducted for the first six months after the coming into force of Bill C-22, and I quote:

[Translation]

The results of the study prove that 83 per cent of drug prices have not increased.

Senator Guay: The other 17 per cent show an outrageous increase!

Senator Cogger: Senator Guay, please. It goes on:

In some cases they are lower. Also, the prices of 96.3 per cent of the 1,235 drugs considered have gone up less or just as much as the Consumer Price Index . . .

Ninety-six point three per cent—

[English]

So only 3.7 per cent of prices increased at a rate higher than that of the consumer price index while 96 per cent increased at a rate lower or at the same level.

Senator Buckwold: Do you really believe that, if I may ask a question?

Senator Cogger: You ask Peat Marwick, sir; this is their published report. Do you believe Senator Haidasz's study? I don't.

Senator Haidasz: It was verified by Statistics Canada!

Senator Cogger: I suggest to honourable senators that, after long and arduous effort last year, after a long pilgrimage—it was a long, hot summer, was it not, senator?

Senator Bonnell: It was so; we worked hard.

Senator Cogger: After that effort, we finally put together Bill C-22, which put into place the findings of Dr. Eastman's commission. I say to honourable senators that Dr. Eastman had the powers he had only because the Senate and the House of Commons gave them to him. I say to honourable senators that, under the law, there is a four-year statutory review of this legislation.

[Translation]

Four years from now, the government will review the impact of Bill C-22.

[Senator Cogger.]

[English]

Senator Frith: And we intend to do it!

Senator Haidasz: Poor people can't wait for you!

Senator Cogger: Let us conduct that review in four years. Let us not bring in a premature bill, the consequences of which we do not know.

I want to say two things to those who care to listen. Senator Haidasz attended the National Finance Committee when the president of the Medical Research Council appeared before it. Is it not interesting to note that in talking about research in general he said that we did not have to worry too much about medical and pharmaceutical research because Bill C-22 is in place? He said that, as a result of Bill C-22, there is now great cooperation between the universities and the industry. Senator Haidasz did not like that, but that is what was said in committee. I invite any senator who did not attend that meeting to verify that.

Secondly, anyone who cares to read the newspapers will know that tomorrow the Prime Minister will be in the company of representatives of the Merck-Frosst Company in Montreal—yes, in Montreal, but it has also taken place in other parts of the country—inaugurating a $30 million research facility, the commitment to which was a direct result of Bill C-22.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: I say to honourable senators that, although some of them do not like it, Bill C-22 is a fact of life—God knows we worked hard enough to bring it together. I say this to honourable senators: Let us not destroy it by an ill-conceived, premature effort to throw a monkey wrench into the works. There are safeguards built into this legislation. Let us live with Bill C-22. Senators opposite will have their turn in four years—or the government will—to review it. For the time being, let us leave well enough alone, and perhaps send Bill S-15 back to the library, where it belongs.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Cogger would deal with a question. It is really a very simple one. There seems to be a great deal of dispute as to what has actually happened with regard to drug prices. One report says one thing while another report says another. The problem with consultants is famous.

Senator Barootes: It is like the problem with university professors.

Senator Stewart: Yes, and medical doctors—this problem crops up in certain professions.

The problem with consultants, it is said, is that they like to give their employers the kind of response their employers are seeking. Why do we not make it clear that the bill will go to committee where an objective inquiry will be conducted? It is the right of the Senate to reject the bill at third reading, if it is the finding of the committee that there are no grounds for its passage. In that way Senator Cogger can demonstrate to the Senate and to the country at large how effective Bill C-22 is. The regime of that bill will not be disturbed at all by the adducing of evidence before the Senate committee. Would Senator Cogger be prepared to put his position to that test?

Senator Cogger: Honourable senators, Senator Stewart knows full well that, if it is the will of the majority to create another committee and do a study, it is their right.

I cannot disagree with you, Senator Stewart. However, I will ask my leadership to beg off the committee, having suffered enough during the last time round.

By the way, thank you for giving me an opportunity to speak again. I had forgotten an argument. I forgot to say how premature the whole exercise is. It is interesting to note that the Commissioner of Patents is currently on a cross-Canada tour. Yesterday he was in Montreal; he will be in Regina on June 21; he will be in Calgary on June 22; he will be in Vancouver on June 23, et cetera.

The Commissioner of Patents is inviting representations from groups such as research and development associations, Canadian universities and colleges and technical associations. Why should we at this time purport to thwart his efforts or preempt his judgments by bringing in an unduly punitive system, under Bill S-15, which would single us out in the industrialized world? Let the poor gentleman conduct his work. Let Dr. Eastman get some experience under his belt before you purport to preempt his judgment.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, every action demands a reaction. Obviously, the statements that have been presented to us by our honourable colleague demand a response, because he has brought back rather pleasant memories of a difficult summer, and one which I am sure will eventually rebound to the embarrassment of a government that brought in, as I have said, one of the worst pieces of legislation that have gone through this chamber and this Parliament in a long time.

An Hon. Senator: A sell-out to the pharmaceuticals!

Senator Perrault: They did not need the ten years, and they admitted it.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Are you speaking on the adjournment?

Senator Buckwold: No, I am speaking on the debate. Is there some question in that regard?

Senator Barootes: I should like to take the adjournment on Bill S-15.

Senator Stewart: He is acting now like a consultant.

Senator Frith: Will you Saskatchewan people try to get along?

Senator Buckwold: I gather that what I am about to say is a bitter pill for the opposition to swallow, if I can carry on the metaphor, and pills are getting more and more expensive, as are consultants.

Senator Perrault: They want us to take tranquilizers.

Senator Buckwold: I would like to tell you a story I heard recently about consultants. A tomcat wandered the neighbourhood to the point where he was becoming a problem. His owners had him neutered. When he returned home from the veterinarian, he gathered with his friends, who said, "Let's go out." The tomcat said, "No; now I am a consultant." I am glad that reference was made to consultants, and I am sure that those who want to pay for a consultant will get the kinds of answer they are looking for, if the price is right.

Honourable senators, let us not forget that, after going through the whole exercise on Bill C-22, some of us, emotionally and deeply, felt that a good policy, one which had been carried on in Canada and to the envy of almost the entire world, had been destroyed in the government's quest for free trade. Let us not get into a long argument, but anyone who knows the scene knows that a so-called level playing field was demanded by our friends in Washington. Then we ended up with Bill C-22, essentially eliminating competition among generic drugs.

In the end, what did this Senate do? We offered three amendments. We did not change the philosophy. We wanted the bill to work. Our first amendment was to create an effective price-control board, the so-called Drug Prices Review Board. The witnesses we heard from told us time and time again that the powers of the board, which are still there, were not sufficient to deal with the problem of rising prescription drug prices. Anyone with any business sense knew that that would happen very quickly. The Senate said, "Please put a little teeth into this bill." That was ignored. We did not change the philosophy of the bill; we just said, "Give it a little strength."

The second amendment would have put certain regulations for commitments for research into the legislation. We were worried that the so-called billion dollars that was going to be spent might be spent now and would gradually disappear. Although I am pleased to hear that a $30 million investment is being made in the province of Quebec in the pharmaceutical industry, some of us might believe that that is being announced now for political reasons; some of us might believe that that investment would have been made in any case. However, the Senate has said that there should be an assurance that the promises of the drug companies for future commitments for research are fulfilled.

Our third amendment said that we should not eliminate prescription drugs of a generic nature that came on the market after this bill was first tabled in June of 1986.

Those were the three and only things we asked for. We listened to Harvie Andre express, in absolute dismay, that we were ruining his bill, and that the Senate should "literally" be blown up, because we were trying to put into his bill—a bill we did not support philosophically—some safeguards that would stop the kind of bill that is being presented to us today. In other words, we had fears that there would be an explosion of prescription drug prices.

I would say this to my dear friend, Senator Cogger: I hope your health is so good that you do not have to buy prescription drugs, because you will see what has happened. Those of us who sometimes have to buy prescription drugs and who have bought the same drug over a period of time—and I happen to be one—have watched the prices go up. I have to say that you too would be embarrassed by what has happened.

The Drug Prices Review Board does not have any power. It has had several months to become established and it is still not operating. Yes, the Commissioner of Patents is travelling across the country, but he is not discussing drug prices. From the brief excerpts that were given to us by Senator Cogger, and from what I have read, he is for the most part discussing the question of research in universities.

I suggest that the Senate—at least on this side—has done the best it could to preclude the very problems we face now. We anticipated them. They are here and they are real.

Senator Bonnell's motion is one that may give the kind of impetus to that great protector, the Drug Prices Review Board, to do the job it is not yet doing because it is not yet established. Even though this may be an embarrassment to the government, I hope those on the other side will recognize the importance to the people of Canada of the exploding cost of health care because of drug prices and that they will support the motion that has been so ably put by our distinguished colleague, Senator Bonnell.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Cogger a question. He seems to be quite familiar with the study carried out by Peat Marwick. Can he give us the dates when the study began and when it ended? Would it be possible to obtain a copy of the study?

● (1500)

Senator Cogger: All I was looking at was a press release—a summary of the study. However, I will certainly get the original for you and be pleased to offer it to you. It covers a six-month period, and will shortly cover May 1 or June 1.

Senator Guay: When you get that information for me, will you also let me know who called for and is paying for the study?

Senator Cogger: The study was conducted at the request of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association, and they paid for it.

Senator Buckwold: The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, as I have already spoken on Bill S-15, I cannot make a speech, but I take this opportunity to ask Senator Cogger two questions.

First, can he expound on his answer to Senator Guay? Was this study by Peat Marwick done for PMAC, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada, or for certain pharmaceutical companies?

Senator Cogger: I thought I just answered that; it was done for PMAC.

Senator Haidasz: I am glad to hear that the Prime Minister will go to Montreal tomorrow to open some kind of facility at Merck.

In view of the fact that the federal government has been doling out millions and millions of dollars to almost everyone over the past few months—perhaps because a federal election campaign will take place later this year—I would ask Senator Cogger whether the Prime Minister will also announce tomorrow that certain moneys are being set aside for the 20 per cent of the Canadian population not insured in any way for prescription drugs. Could he say whether that is so? If the Prime Minister will not do anything along that line, will he ask the Prime Minister to do so?

Senator Frith: Sure, he will!

Senator Cogger: Senator Haidasz knows full well that I cannot answer for the Prime Minister. Had I known it would lead to questions like that, I would not have departed from my research. However, as to Senator Guay's question, I will provide the study. Concerning the other line of questioning, I find it abhorrent that in a chamber such as this a shadow would be cast over the reputation of a firm—be it Peat Marwick or any other—on the basis that it was paid. The world is full of consultants—

An Hon. Senator: And lawyers!

Senator Cogger:—and I do not think it is proper to suggest that, because they sell their services and conduct research, the result thereof is less than professional, less than correct and less than accurate merely because they hire their services out.

Senator Stewart: I have a brief question.

Does Senator Cogger find it strange in any way that the result of a study, done on the commission of the pharmaceutical association during a period prescribed by the association, reveals precisely the result that the association itself would find in its interest to have revealed? You prescribe the period and perform exactly as you—

Senator Perrault: A happy coincidence!

Senator Stewart:—want the result to show. Of course, the consultants produce a reliable report, which shows that they have taken an accurate picture of what you set out to perform. You are a lawyer; does that surprise you?

Senator Cogger: Again, it goes back to the same kind of affirmation I just made. Why does the senator presume the kind of results that he says? Does he know that, or is he just throwing out something that he assumes? You do not know that, senator. I suggest that you do not know that.

Senator Stewart: No—

Senator Doody: Of course he knows it!

Senator Stewart:—let us assume together that the results are perfectly accurate.

Senator Cogger: Let's not assume anything!

Senator Stewart: All right. Let us say that we accept the results as being perfectly accurate. Would it be surprising that the results would be precisely what the pharmaceutical company intended them to be—

Senator Perrault: A happy coincidence!

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Stewart:—since they were recording the actions of the pharmaceuticals during the period in which they had themselves selected to be surveyed? If they wanted a revealing survey, why was the survey not made, for example, for the six-month period to which the senator refers, plus the six previous months, or even the previous year?

Senator Cogger: I do not think I have to answer that; I do not know the answer to that. It is an old technique that is well known: If you do not like an Angus Reid poll, you question the professionalism or the bias of Angus Reid.

Senator Stewart: I am not questioning their professionalism!

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to do three things. First, I apologize to my friend, Senator Buckwold, for interrupting his presentation. I thought he was only asking a question and was moving the adjournment. I defer and apologize for that inappropriate action on my part.

Senator Perrault: Don't do it again!

Senator Barootes: The second point is that the consultant in whose research I believe has to be the professional versus the corner drugstore man at Parkdale—

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

An Hon. Senator: Take it back!

Senator Barootes:—who also has a vested interest.

Third, I would like to move the adjournment of this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we propose to support this motion for adjournment, but I think Senator Cogger and Senator Doody will testify that they will not be taken by surprise when I say that we would like to have this question put, and have wanted it put for some time. Therefore, we will be asking that the question be put next week, and we will be opposing—

Senator Doody: The guillotine!

Senator Frith: Yes, precisely.

Senator Doody: Free speech!

An Hon. Senator: Closure, no free speech!

Senator Frith: We will certainly give, and have given, plenty of opportunity for free speech.

The debate on this bill has been adjourned for quite some time. There was plenty of opportunity for senators to speak, if they had wanted to. It is free filibustering that we are meaning to close off, not free speech.

I want to make it clear—so that no one will be surprised—that, if further adjournments are sought next week that prevent the question being put, we will be opposing such adjournments.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Barootes, debate adjourned.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield the floor to Senator Doyle.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition, in his remarks to the Senate this week, drew our attention to CTV's "Question Period" program televised on May 28 of this year. I am sure that many senators listened to the lucid, informative, might I say subdued, dialogue on free trade that took place between Senator Frith and Mr. John Crosbie.

Senator Frith: Where did you get those adjectives to describe it?

• (1510)

Senator Doyle: Still, I do not think that even Senator Frith would accuse me of being characteristically obtuse if I admitted to coming away from the program somewhat confused about which remarks I had heard were intended to deal with the subject matter of the Free Trade Agreement and which were limited to the legislation to implement the celebrated treaty. I agree with Senator MacEachen that the agreement and Bill C-130 are separate things, just as a vase and water are separate things, though the tulip might be forgiven for thinking that they serve a single purpose, and either one without the other would not help at all.

Senator Frith: Mr. Crosbie was the one who said they were the same, not I.

Senator Doyle: Surely our stars of television were agitated about both subject matter and legislative process, and the concern of their audience was with how the two would come together in law.

We are indebted to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate for his report on the work done over these past seven months by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which, in 34 meetings, studied the treaty that will enhance trade between Canada and the United States. Also, we are impressed with the outline of the work to be done—even, perhaps, accelerated—in the weeks ahead.

However, it is difficult to share Senator MacEachen's concern that "it might be a harmful distraction" for the committee to "interrupt" its present efforts with study of the means proposed by the government to turn intention into action. We are told to go on examining the proposition without reference to, or without even thinking about, how we are to make use of it.

Honourable senators will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was directed last year to deal with two bills having to do with refugees. We were not permitted to deal with those bills simultaneously, because one of them had not yet been dealt with in the other place. The job was eventually done—with the bills being handled concurrently, as judges say when they wish to be particularly harsh with criminals. But our witnesses were sometimes confused by this bizarre treatment and so were committee members. Sometimes it was necessary to call witnesses back for a second appearance, because we could not hear them on Bill C-55 while Bill C-84 was on the table. Time was wasted while we did what we were told.

The situations are not necessarily analogous, but separating subject matter from legislative process at this time could produce similar effects, confusions and delays.

I agree with Senator MacEachen that the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee so far is "money in the bank"; that the committee has gotten "a good head start"; that "it is very much involved in its work and will continue to maintain the momentum". What I cannot believe is that the momentum would be slowed or the work flawed by adding now the dimension of the bill that will enable us to honour the treaty.

The fact is that Canadians are now examining the two things together. They will continue to do so, no matter what the Senate does.

Yesterday the Speaker in the other place ruled that Bill C-130 is admissible in its present form. That is one hurdle that concerned my honourable friend. However, he went on to say: "We have absolutely no idea what the progress will be of the bill through the House of Commons." Would it not be fair to say that those folks in the other place will have absolutely no idea of what the progress will be of the bill through the Senate so long as we leave Senator Murray's motion sleeping on the order paper until the end of July or into August, or whenever the spirit moves us—all the while ignoring debates that engage the country and putting out of our minds skirmishes to grasp legislative turf, such as we have recently seen in my own province of Ontario.

These are not easy times to be from Ontario. Only a couple of weeks ago we were under the lash of the western premiers for our unspeakable prosperity and our unwillingness to share the wealth with provinces too long regarded as shabby consumers of made-in-Ontario widgets. The glass through which we are now seen so darkly is held by those in Ontario's government who have looked upon the move toward freer trade and seen no good in it. For weeks on end Ontario's legislators heard in committee every witness willing to throw a hat over the agreement and have done with its potential for growth and better times across the country. That government, and the NDP—its old ally in power, need I remind you—fuss and fume at the prospect of a vast extension of the kind of agreement that provided the Midas touch to the automobile industry; an extension that would perhaps allow the good times to roll beyond Ontario's borders. We watch them now as they attack the legislation as an invasion of provincial rights.

Honourable senators, it should be encouraging to us that the Premier of Ontario, for the most part, rests his case against the agreement upon a single situation. That situation, in truth, has its roots not in bilateral trade but in GATT's regulation of multilateral trade, which we all acknowledge is Good—with a capital "G".

There is no one in this chamber, I am sure, who is not sensitive to the nature of the changes to the wine industry that, gradually but eventually, will be necessary if it is to survive competitively. But long before the U.S.-Canadian talks began, the risks of Ontario protectionism were clearly seen; protectionism not only from foreign imports but from out-of-province domestic production. Whether or not freer trade between Canada and the United States is achieved, the GATT action will not go away. Any move to quash it will leave Canada open to retaliation, which could have an incalculable effect in other economic sectors.

Ontario's premier is aware of this. He is aware, too, that the agreement maintains and improves the Auto Pact; that it allows for the retention of regional subsidies; that it maintains agricultural subsidies; protects cultural industries; controls foreign investment and that it is served by a dispute-settlement mechanism.

Enjoying the country's best level of employment—achieved largely under federal job initiatives—the Premier of Ontario is, perhaps, not as concerned as are other provincial leaders with the prospects of higher employment under the pact. But he is not the kind of man that we would expect to be deaf to the advice of such organizations as the Canadian Cattleman's Association, the Consumers' Association of Canada, the Motor Vehicles Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada. Will he not balance what doubts he hears from Robert White of the Canadian Auto Workers Union against the clear case in favour of the agreement made by the likes of Donald Macdonald, Peter Lougheed and his friend, Robert Bourassa of Quebec?

• (1520)

What are we to make of the man, as he is seen by the media? We read in the Toronto Star recently:

The Canada-U.S. free trade deal is dead if it depends on Ontario's approval says Ontario's premier. If a powerful U.S. Senate committee has given Ontario the power to derail the deal, the province will do so, he told reporters yesterday.

The same day we read in the Ottawa Citizen that the premier:—does not want to be known as the leader who destroyed an historic deal, supported by all the other provinces, simply to protect a small domestic monopoly. As a result, he has suggested he would not challenge the pact in court if he could not enlist some other provinces to support his case. . . . Now, however, the U.S. Senate has given Peterson the unwanted option of being able to torpedo the deal simply by refusing to give an assurance of compliance. Canada's future may well depend on the Premier's ability to resist the reactionary forces of parochial politics.

And again, that same day, we read Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail:

As things stand, Ontario can count only on Prince Edward Island, an ally with a heart larger than its means. The Opposition of the Ontario Government (public opinion is something altogether different) to an initiative sought by eight provinces and the federal government does not bode well for national harmony. Ever heard of the Ontario bogeyman, the central Canadian conspiracy, the Upper Canadian capitalists? If not, tune in shortly.

And there, honourable senators, is where things stand—or wobble or waver—in the province which is my home, and the city where I was born. On one horn of the dilemma, the possibility of refusal to abide by Bill C-130 and thus save the grog shops, or, on the other horn, a decision to walk away with dignity from disruption of a truly national pursuit of a trading accommodation and law that would permit this country to compete and prosper as other countries already do in market spheres of wide scope and vast potential.

I cannot believe that Mr. David Peterson would be offended to hear words on free trade spoken in this chamber more than a hundred years ago by the great Liberal reformer, the distinguished senator from Toronto, the Honourable George Brown:

Treaties of the comprehensive character of that proposed with the United States ought not to be—cannot be—adjusted by ounce scales. By the removal of all artificial barriers in the way of fair exchange of the products of industry, both parties must benefit. No man sells unless he benefits by doing so and no one buys unless he sees advantage to it.

But some honourable senators—no word of partisanship on their lips—may still ask if there are not anomalies in this agreement. Are there flaws in the legislation that they can point out to the doubters in the government of Ontario?

The best way to answer the questions is to get on with the job, all of the job, and try to have our work done within the framework and time the treaty sets out. It is difficult to suppose how we might manage that without allowing the Foreign Affairs Committee to deal with pact and process as they now exist and as they are now perceived by committee members and by the people we are supposed to represent in this chamber and its precincts—without letting the hand fit the glove.

Can we not, in this most important undertaking, demonstrate what the papers call "Senate activism" by supporting the government leader's case for the common sense of pre-study of Bill C-130?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have listened with wonderment and amazement. We have a resolution before us with respect to a possible pre-study of the Free Trade Agreement made by the Prime Minister with the United States. Instead of addressing that agreement, the honourable senator has taken the opportunity to assault the Province of Ontario, to attack the Premier of Ontario and to attack the Government of Ontario. This is the most important economic arrangement ever made in the history of Canada, and if the premiers of this country do not stand up and point out those sections of the agreement that cause them some concern they are not fulfilling their mandate to their electorate.

Senator Buckwold: Right!

Senator Steuart: Right on!

Senator Perrault: Mr. Peterson is fully justified in taking the position he has taken. He has a number of concerns, as do we all. Let me use the Province of British Columbia as an example. The other day the B.C. Federation of Agriculture came to Ottawa. They say that the Okanagan fruit industry and wine industry will be devastated. The B.C. produce industry will be devastated, the dairy industry will be devastated, and the ultimate end of the agricultural sector of British Columbia is that it will become a sufferer on a great scale.

Are we to remain supine and silent while this process is continuing? We are not prepared to do that, and we are not prepared to stand here and justify whether or not we should be in support of a pre-study. The attitude of the government toward free trade is utterly unbelievable. John Crosbie has said to the people of this country, "We will not allow any changes in the Free Trade Agreement. We won't allow any changes in the Meech Lake agreement." The last time we heard that kind of talk was in the Reichstag of 1930 under "Uncle Adolf". We are not going to say "Achtung!" to this government. We are not going to give assent to everything this government wants.

At one time the honourable senators on the other side posed as custodians of human rights and freedoms. You talked in terms of the sacred right to have opposition, to stand up and question. Now your ministers are saying that we must pass the Free Trade Agreement and the Meech Lake Accord and must not affect their delicate mechanisms. They talk, almost obscenely, in terms of the gossamer fabric of the Meech Lake Accord, which must not be touched. I know the consciences of some of the opposition senators in this house are offended by this kind of lingo. I know you better. Are you going to accept this kind of dictum from your political masters in the cabinet?

You tell us that it is very important that we do a pre-study. Of what importance is a pre-study in Canada today if the government insists that the arrangement is not going to be changed in any manner? Does it matter whether we study the agreement now or six months from now, when your Mr. Crosbie is saying, "It won't be changed, regardless of what the opposition says. We are going to ram it through."? I have not seen one measure that has come before Parliament emerge in perfection. I have never seen one tax bill that did not have anomalies and did not require changes.

This deal raises some questions. Why did you send your cabinet colleagues scurrying down to Washington the other day to try to keep those congressmen and senators in line, if you too are not concerned about some of the possible imperfections?

Don't give us the party line. Don't give us a portion of that $30 million budget of taxpayers' funds to propagandize this nation into apathy with respect to the bill.

We are concerned about a government which is increasingly getting out of touch with the people. We have a disaster in the prairie provinces. There is, economically, an unmitigated disaster in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The drought conditions are horrible. Farmers are going bankrupt, and yet we choose, today, to proclaim "Christmas Day" in the constituency of Quebec which the government wants to win by handing out all sorts of goodies in every direction, instead of addressing the problems of the suffering people of this country who are not all enjoying the kind of prosperity that may exist in certain sections of the country.

Honourable senators, I am getting sick and tired of this tired, old party line that we cannot change anything. We should not have to come to this house and justify why we are not supporting a pre-study. Pre-study is not enshrined in parliamentary rules; it is a custom which was adopted several years ago in order to assist with respect to certain legislation. It is now out of hand in some ways, and we see in this matter an effort, inspired by the political leadership and cabinet, to get this legislation through as quickly as possible, without any objections or changes.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Perrault: Certainly, with this kind of propaganda I will take questions.

Senator Barootes: I am sure the honourable senator will recall the year 1966 when he and Senator Molgat, as heads of the Liberal parties of their respective provinces, met with Premier Thatcher in Saskatoon along with the then Liberal leader of Alberta and issued a statement on the first day of the Conference of Liberal Leaders of Western Canada. The four issued a joint statement that they were in unanimous support of free trade with the United States, of more opportunities for foreign investment in Canada, and of a complete rejection of future policies of economic nationalism.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: I would love to answer that. Yes, I support free trade, but I do not support a trade agreement—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Hold your applause.

Senator Perrault: —a jingoistic trade deal, which keeps, in effect, a lumber impost against the lumber industry of British Columbia, which retains the impost against red cedar shingles from British Columbia, and which gives half of the country away in other directions. No, I am not against free trade.

I want to remind the honourable senator that the leader to whom he has given his loyalty campaigned against free trade in the last federal election. He said it was a concept that had no future in Canada and that it posed all sorts of dangers. He was elected on the platform of opposing free trade. Can the honourable senator tell me what caused this great conversion? Was it something like St. Paul on the road to Damascus?

Senator Frith: It was "St. Ronald".

Senator Perrault: Did he see a great light in the sky? St. Paul went blind for a while after he converted, and I am afraid the Prime Minister has gone blind.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister also said, "This little prime minister is going to give new meaning to the word 'patronage' in the next Parliament." Well, he has done that! He has kept that promise! He also campaigned on the basis of opposing free trade and he was supported in that endeavour by Mr. Bourassa of the province of Quebec.

I believe in free trade, but I do not believe in a trade arrangement, worked out between two political leaders, that sells out sections of this country.

Senator Doyle: Will the honourable senator take another question?

Senator Perrault: Why not?

Senator Doyle: Having just been advised that the honourable senator is both sick and tired, I hesitate to ask a question. However, may I, despite his poor health, presume to ask him to please straighten me out on one little point with regard to how delaying pre-study will help?

Senator Frith: That is a new phrase—"delaying pre-study".

Senator Doyle: I mean, to have no pre-study. Let us call it what it is. I am sorry if I offend the honourable senator's ear.

The honourable senator wants to eliminate pre-study. He wants to let the Foreign Affairs Committee go on for weeks and months with what they have been doing, and doing as well as they can without the bill, and then say that we should ignore the bill. How is this going to help the honourable senator or any of the people who sit beside him to find the iniquity, to point out the iniquity and to take the iniquity to the people and demonstrate to them, in our committee, not only what is wrong with the agreement but what is wrong with the legislation? Why does the honourable senator want to leave that? Why is he afraid to come to it? How can he explain to the Ontario government, which is doing its legislative dance to try to hold off the bill, what other faults and failings there are in the legislation, if he refuses to examine the legislation?

Senator Perrault: Let the House of Commons do its job and we shall do our job.

Senator Frith: As we always do.

Senator Perrault: We have always done it in the past and we have always done it very well.

I have yet to receive a reply to my question. How can this senator support this dramatic change of opinion and change of policy, without any explanation, by a prime minister who was elected on the basis of opposing free trade and who was widely quoted across the country? Has the Prime Minister confided in him? What great event occurred in his life? What great experience did he undergo? Did he receive a telephone call from Washington or from somewhere that changed his opinion about free trade? Why has his opposition now melted under the midday sun?

Senator Doyle: I do not presume to answer for the Prime Minister, but I have a recollection of the last election campaign. I recall, of course, that the Prime Minister had his doubts about a free trade agreement at that time. I make no bones about that, but I also remember that far more prominence was given to the fact that the Prime Minister was dreadfully concerned with the low state to which relations with the United States had fallen during the administration of the previous government. One of the first things on his order paper was a rejuvenation of good relations with the American people. He did begin to pursue that, and if in the process he found that there were trade advantages to this country he made no secret of them. He hastened to tell us all about them.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: I am surprised to hear what the honourable senator has just said, because during the time of the previous government the relationship with the United States was a very healthy one. They knew precisely where we stood. The poet from New England, Robert Frost, said that honest fences make honest neighbours. We were on the side of a very honest fence. If the price of friendship is to give away sovereignty, resources, water supplies and make a bad deal in lumber, I would not call that a good relationship; I would regard that as a servant-master relationship. That is servility and I am not prepared to see that happen to this country. Again, I have not heard from any Conservative the rationale for this great, agonizing twist in Conservative policy. Years ago the Conservative Party was somewhat more concerned about Canadian values and Canadian independence than it seems to be at the present time.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, when I came to this place less than a decade ago, I was warned that, if you wanted to maintain even a semblance of popularity, you would be smart not to speak on a Thursday. It is apparent that others in this chamber did not receive that instruction, or, if they did, did not follow it.

I am not intending to enter into the rapid crossfire situation that exists between these two senators. I am too old, too moderate, too restrained and too modest to get into that, but I was impressed by something the honourable senator across the way mentioned. I think he talked about it being "Christmas in Quebec". I am not from Quebec. I am very, very poor in the language of the great majority of the people of that province, but during my long lifetime of being interested in politics, and I went to my first political meeting when I was 11 years old, by God!—and that was not yesterday or a couple of decades ago either—I often thought how important it was that those of us who lived in the other provinces could talk with, understand and show that we cared about the people who spoke a different language but who inhabited and loved the same country.

I thought this morning, when I read in the press and heard and saw on the electronic media that there would be an event in Quebec attended by the Prime Minister of Canada, of the Progressive Conservative Party, and by the Premier of Quebec, of the Liberal Party, that something was being done to help the people of that province.

I come from the smallest of the ten provinces. We have plenty of problems there, plenty of legitimate requests for assistance; but who would say that a measure of reasonable assistance and an extension of cooperation between the federal government and the Government of Quebec would be something that one would denigrate and scorn as mere "venture-ism" for partisan purposes? I thought it was great Canadianism.

As to whether or not the Prime Minister is going through a stage where he might be struck blind, I do not know, but, in this regard, I thought that perhaps he was more far-sighted than a great many other people and perhaps that might be the reason for the umbrage. I thought it was a great, great day and a great exercise in decent ecumenical Canadianism, and I am all for that.

A reference was made to my favourite poet, Robert Frost. I think he actually said, "Good fences make good neighbours." I believe that that is the era into which we are moving.

As Robert Thompson said, "The Americans are our best friends whether we like it or not." Perhaps it is sensible to realize that underlying fact.

I am sorry that Senator Perrault is upset about certain inconsistencies in the leader of our party.

Senator Doody: Sick and tired!

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, he said he was sick and tired of it. We do not want anybody to get sick and tired, although I do get a bit dozy myself on Thursday afternoons.

It is interesting to note that the one election in which I lost votes—I actually lost ground—was in 1974, when I had a hell of a time trying to explain to the people what the price and incomes program was all about. By the time I had that half explained, the election was over and I had lost several hundred votes. Then I survived a few weeks longer and those who had deprived me of those votes, those who had taken those votes from me over that, exalted this as the cornerstone of the national temple, and we had price and income restraints.

So inconsistency may disturb the pure philosopher that Senator Perrault must be, but we have to remember what Ralph Waldo Emerson said: "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds."

We, in our great Progressive Conservative Party, are not going to be little or mean over this issue.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong this exchange, but may I say that the eloquent diversion of Senator Macquarrie really did not address the question of pre-study whatsoever. He did, by implication, suggest that I am against certain aid to certain sections of this country; on the contrary, I believe that there are many initiatives out there that should be pursued by the federal government. I should like to see, however, the Prime Minister and members of cabinet become seized with the desperate situation that now exists in the prairie provinces, instead of concentrating so particularly on a by-election in one of our Canadian provinces.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if that was a question—and I think it was—I can rise and say that I had no intention of talking about a pre-study or a post-study. I was moved by the eloquence and sparkle of the senator's speech. That is why I intervened and addressed myself to what he said.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

AIR CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-129—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 2, 1988, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-129, An Act to provide for the continuance of Air Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares thereof to the public, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I will take the risk of being unpopular by speaking last on a Thursday afternoon, but I do not know of any better time to address this subject.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion and the opportunity of making a few supporting remarks is to ask my colleagues in this place to agree to a pre-study of Bill C-129, the Air Canada Public Participation Bill. This bill was debated in the other place on second reading on May 24, May 25, May 27, June 1 and June 3, for a total of five days. Some 20 persons spoke during the debate, which took some eight and a half hours. I am informed that the bill was referred to a Legislative Committee yesterday.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is prepared, and indeed eager, to have the bill referred to it for pre-study. The committee is idle at the present time, awaiting with some degree of uncertainty consideration of legislation that may reach the committee over the next few weeks.

This is the second time in two weeks that we have had a motion for pre-study. On May 31 Senator Murray moved a motion to authorize the Foreign Affairs Committee to study the subject matter of Bill C-130. Senator MacEachen adjourned the debate and returned to the matter on June 7. It gave me some encouragement to hear him make this statement in his opening remarks:

Honourable senators, in dealing with the motion that was moved by Senator Murray I want to put aside my frequently stated and well known reservations on the routine use of the pre-study technique and concentrate on whether there is any advantage at this time in initiating a pre-study of the free trade bill.

Honourable senators, I recognize that it is a basic principle of British parliamentary procedure that a bill must be dealt with consecutively in both houses. There are some practical reasons for that. Why would one house bother to consider a bill introduced in another place and not yet adopted therein? Presumably, it would be a waste of time for this house to better a proposal that, in the final instance, was to be rejected by the other. Hence, no house is to undertake pre-study of a bill introduced in the other without having been informed by message that the particular bill has been adopted in the house where it was first introduced.

Another disadvantage of pre-study may be that the exact contribution of the Senate to the legislative process becomes somewhat blurred, at least for the outsider, for there is no formal acknowledgement by the Commons of the senatorial input—a point put to me very strongly by Senator McElman.

Another possible drawback is that the Senate could waste its time in suggesting hundreds of amendments to a bill that will never reach the floor of the Senate because the House will later reject it at third reading.

These are all valid reasons, and it certainly might appear that they have found some favour recently by the majority in this chamber, in that I know of no other way to explain the recent reluctance to refer the subject-matter of a bill to the appropriate committee. Until approximately one year ago the arrangement or procedure which we call pre-study could hardly be termed a failure, in view of the increased willingness of the Senate to take advantage of it. The contrast is striking. Between the years 1971 and 1974 there were five references to committees for the pre-study of the subject-matter of bills, and between the years 1983 and 1986 there were 46 references.

Now, as the Joint Committee on Senate Reform noted in 1984 at page 38 of its report—and I wish that Senator Molgat were in his place—referring to part of their recommendations:

The use of a suspensive veto would supplement rather than displace what is called the pre-study procedure. Pre-study is a most useful arrangement whereby the Senate can begin its consideration of the subject matter of a bill before it has received third reading in the House of Commons, thereby giving the Senate legislative input without formally amending the bill and without risking confrontation. The Senate achieves this input by communicating its views to the House informally. Pre-study should be continued.

And it goes on.

Though often referred to as the "Hayden formula", the pre-study device was not invented by that honourable gentleman. Its origins are to be found in the practice inaugurated during the Second World War by the Honourable James Horace King, who was then Leader of the Government in the Senate. In 1943 he recommended that the Estimates be referred to the Committee on National Finance, before the bills based on the Estimates arrived in the Senate. In 1945 Senator McGeer boldly suggested that all resolutions and bills laid before the House of Commons should be examined concurrently by the Senate and, although this sweeping change was not accepted, some royal commission reports and international agreements were examined in the Senate before the arrival of the legislation based upon them in 1945 and 1948, and in 1951 and 1958.

The revival of the procedure was chiefly the work of Senator Salter Hayden. On September 14, 1971, he successfully moved that his committee be authorized to examine and consider the summary of the 1971 tax reform legislation tabled that very day and "any bills based on the budget resolution in advance of the said bills coming before the Senate". Speaking to the motion, the Honourable Paul Martin, then Leader of the Government in the Senate, said, "We are not dealing with the principle of the bill. We are anticipating the bill", and he christened the procedure "pre-examination and study".

Since then an examination of the practice reveals three interesting trends. First, there was a growing popularity of the device. From 1971 to 1974 there were only five orders of reference involving in the subject-matter of bills. From 1974 to 1979 there were 30. During the Thirty-second Parliament, from 1980 to 1984, there were 34, while not less than 42 were adopted during the First Session of the Thirty-third Parliament, from 1984 to 1986.

● (1550)

The second interesting trend is the diffusion of its use. Between 1971 and 1979 27 references out of 35 were sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was chaired by Senator Hayden, but the Thirty-second Parliament witnessed many other committees taking advantage of the procedure. The Agriculture Committee had one; the National Finance Committee had seven; the Health, Welfare and Science Committee and its successor had five; the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee had three; and the Transport and Communications Committee had three. Of course, the reference of the subject-matter of the security intelligence legislation to a special committee, chaired by Senator Pitfield, produced one of the most oft-quoted examples of the usefulness of this procedure.

The third trend became apparent in the eighties through the increased willingness of the government to apply to bills the pre-study procedure. Prior to 1980, the motion for referral of the subject-matter of a bill to a committee was usually introduced by its chairman. In contrast, some two-thirds of the references for the period 1980 to 1984 found their origins in motions introduced by the Leader of the Government in the Senate or by his deputy. All of the references in the 1984 to 1986 session originated with the government.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to develop any lengthy reasons to show that the advantages of this procedure are obvious. I think senators realize that they are. Pre-study saves time. It allows for a valuable Senate input that cannot be interpreted as a challenge to the House of Commons. It is a flexible device, for it is not, strictly speaking, a formal procedural step, such as any of the three readings given to bills. No rule of the Senate has attempted to formalize it and it is not compulsory. Whether to resort to this device is left to the Senate to decide, on a motion put by one of its members. Recently, however, this decision has been the subject of an informal conversation between the two leaders or their deputies. The rest of us are left to wonder about the reasons for delaying a reference to a committee.

I suggest that the chamber might occasionally have a voice in the decision to refer a bill so that, if it is not referred—and there may, indeed, be valid reasons for that, at least there would be a formal record of the reasons. I find it distressing that the leaders in this place appear to be unable to come to an informal, amicable agreement as to why a bill should or should not be referred. I have no difficulty in understanding the adversarial nature of this chamber, but I would like to see the opposing views expressed here. Otherwise, warranted or not, there are suspicions of mischief or game-playing.

Therefore, honourable senators, the questions I put to my colleagues are: Is the procedure known as "pre-study" up for re-examination? Is it being discouraged or is it being eliminated? If not, is it to be restricted to those bills that are complex, technical and do not raise deep party issues? A substantial portion of public legislation falls within this category. Why have so many issues that are related to the Senate been discussed in the media rather than in this house? Quite often I can find out more about what is going on here in the media than I can in the chamber.

Because most bills that we handle have secured the support of the elected representatives of the people, the House of Commons expects quick approval of them. I do not consider that the other place is blameless, but the result of these trends is that scores of bills are sent to the Senate in the final days of the session. We are expected to adopt them quickly and without changes. I can see why this is resisted, but what is the alternative other than pre-study? Let me add that just because a bill has been the subject of pre-study does not mean that I would for one moment suggest that it ought not to receive further study.

Senator Frith: That is what we were told on Bill C-22.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, these and other questions come to mind, but my final point is simply that pre-study can be cited as an example of how the efficiency of the Senate can be enhanced without any formal change to the law, to the Constitution or to the standing orders. As such, it fits appropriately into the Canadian political tradition. If it is to be limited or eliminated, surely we can have the reasons for that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear hear!

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 14, 1988, at 2 p.m.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Peter Bosa presented Bill S-18, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Bosa, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, June 16, 1988.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-204, An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 8, 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR TREMBLAY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I move, for Senator Haidasz, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, over the years we have usually followed the practice of not abridging the one day's notice required for third reading of a bill except when Royal Assent is planned. We have often considered abridging the one day's notice when Royal Assent has been provided for that day. Senator Flynn first made this point, and I thought quite reasonably, some years ago.

I understand from Senator Doody that there will be Royal Assent today. For that reason we shall be glad to give leave for third reading today, provided that this bill can get Royal Assent later today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Royal Assent is planned for later today, senator. However, to my embarrassment, I must say that several senators have expressed an interest in speaking on third reading of this bill. I did not expect to receive it so expeditiously. I commend Senator Tremblay and his committee members on the speed and efficiency with which they handled this particular piece of legislation. It is amazing what the NDP can do, when they put their minds to it, in the Senate! I had thought they were dedicated to our extinction, but it seems that they have achieved a remarkable working relationship with us.

In any event, I would prefer, if it were the wish of the Senate, to delay third reading of this bill until the next sitting.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, for Senator Haidasz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has the honour to presents its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-74, An Act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, 1st June 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 5, clause 6: Strike out line 42 and substitute the following therefor:

"paragraph 34(1)(a), (b), (c), (d), (o) or"

2. Page 40, clause 52: Strike out lines 21 and 22, and re-letter the subsequent subparagraph accordingly.

3. Page 92, clause 149: In the French version, strike out line 10 and substitute the following therefor:

“fixées par proclamation.”

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, the committee is studying Bill C-89, proposing amendments to the Criminal Code relating to victims of violence. Professor Irvin Waller, whom I had arranged to have appear last week, can only attend today from 3.30 until 4.30 p.m. Then we have Mr. Justice Linden, president of the Law Reform Commission of Canada. Unfortunately, he, too, can only appear today, and we are anxious to hear both those witnesses.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON CORPORATION

APPROVED PROJECTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a few questions arising from the speech he gave in this chamber on May 31 on Bill C-103.

[Senator Hastings,]

The first question has to do with a number of projects which the leader stated had been approved by Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation at the end of April of this year. Could the leader provide us with a list of those projects, their locations, the number of jobs involved and the sums attached to each project?

I could have put this question on the order paper, but I thought that it might be more direct to express my interest in the chamber and that the information might come forward more quickly by doing so.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think our colleague, Senator Graham, asked for the same information during the course of the committee meeting held last Wednesday evening. I undertook then to obtain whatever information is available. I shall do so.

Senator MacEachen: I regret having missed that committee meeting, but I had another commitment.

POLICIES TO BE FOLLOWED

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): The leader also made this further comment, which I shall read, dealing with the Industrial Development Division of Devco:

To the government, it seems only logical that we should bring the Industrial Development Division of Devco, which is an organization involved in regional development, into the ACOA family as well.

Are the overall policies followed by ACOA the policies that will be followed by Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation? Is that what is meant by bringing it “into the ACOA family”?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, in some respects it is fair to say that there would be a different policy framework for Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation as the continuation of the present Industrial Development Division of Devco. That different policy framework is not, so far as I am aware, inconsistent with the overall mandate for regional economic development given to ACOA, but there would be no purpose in continuing IDD as Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation if there were not some different policy framework and Cape Breton-specific objectives.

FUNDING OF AGRICULTURAL PROJECTS—POWERS—ROLE OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would I be correct in concluding that, while ACOA, as a whole, will not be involved in infrastructure, for example, or not involved directly in assistance to farmers, the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will still be enabled to fund projects in the field of infrastructure, in the field of agriculture, as has been presently done by the Industrial Development Division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators, those are valid examples of activities in which Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, as a continuation of IDD, could continue to be engaged and in which ACOA, generally speaking, is not engaged. Again, in answer to questions from our colleague, Senator Graham, I did discuss the quite worthwhile activities of ACOA in encouraging economic activities and enterprises that are related to agriculture and fisheries. However, that is not what the honourable senator is asking. The short answer to his question is: yes.

Senator MacEachen: So that the president of ACOA, Mr. McPhail, would be rejecting applications under current guidelines for assistance to agriculture in New Brunswick or western Nova Scotia, but he would be approving them for Cape Breton under the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I have stated previously, the generality of the case with regard to Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is that ECBC will not be prevented from doing anything that the Industrial Development Division of Devco is now doing. However, I do want to take slight exception to the statement that the honourable senator has made to the effect that the president of ACOA would now be rejecting applications for assistance to agriculture. That is a very broad statement that would need to be considerably nuanced in order to be factual or to describe the situation as it exists.

Again, the other night I reported to the committee that ACOA does assist business enterprises that are related to agriculture and fisheries and I gave the example of a plant in Prince Edward Island, which, in company with Senator Phillips, I had the honour and pleasure of opening a few weeks ago—a plant to wash, grade and package potatoes for the export market.

The objective of this enterprise is to improve the quality of a local product for export to the United States. Therefore, ACOA has provided quite considerable assistance to this enterprise. The interesting thing about the enterprise, in connection with the honourable senator's question, is that the equity for it was put up by 40 local potato producers. Now, is that assistance to agriculture or is it not? I think it is.

However, we are not attempting to design or implement the kinds of programs of assistance to agriculture that are carried out either by the line departments, federally or provincially, or under the aegis of the ERDA subagreements on agriculture which we now have or will shortly have with each of the four provinces in that region.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that the contention is that the mandate of the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation is compatible or consistent with, or broader than, or identical—

Senator Murray: "Identical" is not too strong a word!

Senator MacEachen: —to the Industrial Development Division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. That contention has been made, and I do not intend to question it, at least not now. Let us just say that that is the case. Presumably, ACOA as a whole will have a set of guidelines which it will apply broadly to the whole of the Atlantic provinces. However, within the family, as was mentioned by the minister, there is this adult, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, which, theoretically, has broader powers. In other words, it will require a policy-decision by the president of ACOA as to whether those broader powers will be exercised.

The minister has applied a very broad definition to agriculture and has used the example of a processing plant or an enterprise. Let us take the case of farmers. ACOA will not be permitted to assist farmers directly. Will Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation be permitted, under the policy of the president, to assist farmers directly, as has been the case in the past?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are entering into an area of hypothesis here. It seems to me that I answered the question fully when I said that they will have the power to do what they are doing now. I know of no reason why, if they are now providing useful assistance to small farming operations in Cape Breton, they could not continue to do so. There is no policy reason in the world why they could not.

I also want to emphasize to the Leader of the Opposition that the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will have not just a minister and a president, the same minister and the same president as ACOA has, but also a board of directors of its own which will presumably have some say in the policy of the organization.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not think the minister has answered the question satisfactorily. It will require a policy decision by the minister and the deputy minister—in this case, Mr. McPhail—as to whether it is possible for one member of the family to have greater powers or greater amplitude of action than all the other ACOA areas. The minister has said that he sees no reason why not; but has a policy decision been made to implement that possibility? That is where the case rests. Mr. McPhail, as president, will have to decide to apply a different set of guidelines to Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation than he will apply in the rest of Atlantic Canada, if those powers are to be exercised.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I trust that the honourable senator is not scandalized by that proposition. Why does he think that in establishing the corporation we gave it the same legal powers as the Industrial Development Division of Devco? It was precisely so that they could exercise those powers. There had to be such a policy decision to bring in the bill in the first place.

The honourable senator has talked about guidelines. Under the ACOA legislation, as he will have seen, the minister has the power to designate certain areas of the region for specific periods of time and to bring in regulations that would differ in those particular areas from regulations that are in force elsewhere in the region. Yes, guidelines will differ and programs will be flexible. Part of the whole concept of the agency is that we will be able to respond to the different needs and opportunities in different parts of the region. As I told some people in Cape Breton in the first week I had responsibility, I would, in practical terms, continue to regard them as a distinct society.

Senator MacEachen: I am not scandalized at all at the answer if it is to the effect that the guidelines that will operate, policywise, with respect to Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be wider and will give greater amplitude of action than those that apply generally to ACOA.

The minister understands, of course, that, even though we use the term "ACOA", it is just a government department, with a minister and a deputy minister. The deputy minister of ACOA is also the president of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. He is the boss, like any deputy minister is, and the board of directors—subject to the minister, of course—in this case, with respect to Enterprise Cape Breton, is purely advisory to the deputy and to the minister, the boss.

Senator Murray: I think not. I think they are in a different position. My friend said the board "is purely advisory." I think he was referring to the board of ACOA. What I am saying to him is that the board of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will have pretty much the same powers as the board of Devco had in relation to IDD.

Senator MacEachen: Would the minister confirm that?

Senator Murray: I think the bill confirms it in general.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think you can have a board of directors and a minister and deputy minister in charge simultaneously. The animal just could not walk.

If the minister is telling me that the intention is to give Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation the same authority, vis-à-vis a minister, as Cape Breton Development Corporation presently has, then I think I am helped. If that is not reflected in the bill, then I am encouraged, perhaps, to amend it.

Senator Murray: Of course, we shall have an opportunity to look at that when I appear as the closing witness before the committee—which I hope will be soon.

Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be a crown corporation. It has a mandate almost identical to that of the Industrial Development Division of Devco. As a crown corporation, it will have a board of directors which—and I make this as a general statement—will have the same mandate and powers in respect to ECBC as the board of directors of Devco has in respect of the IDD.

There is a provision, which I referred to in the course of my speech on second reading, that enables the minister to give direction to the head of the organization, but, as I said, I see nothing to be scandalized about in that regard. There is a power of direction given to the Governor in Council over other crown corporations, including Cape Breton Development Corporation.

These are finer points—I agree they are important—that we can explore in more detail in committee.

Senator MacEachen: I appreciate what the minister has said, because it seems to me that, if the new Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation has the same status as the Cape Breton Development Corporation had, that changes the perspective a great deal.

I add that it appears to me, subject to clarification of the finer points—if that is the right way to put it—that, when you have a president of ACOA and a president of Enterprise Cape Breton, the deputy minister stands in the same relationship to those agencies as any other deputy minister: he is the boss. But that is not how Devco operates. No minister or deputy minister bosses Devco around. That is one of my concerns at any rate, and I am prepared to wait to hear further evidence in committee.

● (1430)

Senator Murray: I think that the president of Devco has deputy-head status, whatever that may mean, but the person who runs the Industrial Development Division is a vice-president of Devco.

Senator MacEachen: The president of Devco, with two vice-presidents under him, ran both sides of Devco. No minister, in my 20 years' experience in government, ever directed Devco on any particular point. Devco submitted its budgets directly to Treasury Board, had them approved and ran its own show. There was no project approval by any deputy minister; that was done by the organization itself. At any rate, I apologize to honourable senators for having gone on too long; I should do this elsewhere.

TIBET

DALAI LAMA'S FIVE-POINT PEACE PLAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Senators may have noticed recently an intermittent but steady flow of horror stories of suppression of the Tibetan people in their homeland. The Dalai Lama presented a five-point peace plan to the United States Congress in September of last year. Since that time, I am informed, the plan has been accorded the support of the Congress of the United States, the West German Bundesrat and the European Parliament. Canada, however, is not included among those giving formal support to the Dalai Lama's five-point peace plan. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to explain why that is so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I shall do so, honourable senators.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ELIGIBILITY AND CRITERIA FOR WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I note, with gratitude, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has announced that $200 million will be given over the next five years to Canadian veterans who served for Canada. They will become eligible for the VIP program or the Aging Veterans Program. I brought this matter before the Senate a week or so ago. I see that he took my advice and I thank him for it. I think that is great. I did not realize the minister paid so much attention to what happens in the Senate, but it seems that he does. He also thinks about our veterans.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us if that also means that those Canadian veterans who served for at least one year but remained in Canada are also eligible for the War Veterans Allowance?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The short answer to the last part of the question, honourable senators, is no. The announcement made by my colleague, Mr. Hees, concerns the so-called VIP program and its application only to Canadian-service veterans. With great respect to the honourable senator's influence and to my own, I think it would be proper to give credit where credit is due; that is, to the Canadian Legion, which has been pressing this case for some time, and to an extraordinarily dedicated and effective minister, the Honourable George Hees.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I agree that the Canadian Legion also deserves credit. It has also been asking that these other veterans receive the War Veterans Allowance. According to the minister, that has not yet come into effect.

Since this would be on a means test or a needs test, would the Leader of the Government know the criteria or know the figure for the means test at this time?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am afraid I do not. I do not have the details of the new program in front of me, but I shall obtain that information and ensure that my honourable friend receives a copy.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPRAYING OF POISONOUS NERVE GASES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, according to an article in The Ottawa Citizen of June 14, 1988, the Government of Canada has been spraying poisonous nerve gases over 12 square kilometres of Canada. Apparently, there was no prior warning that this spraying of poisonous nerve gases would take place. According to this article, researchers have dispersed a poisonous gas called tabun, another poisonous gas called sarin, another poisonous gas called soman and a poisonous gas called mustard, which was responsible for the death of many veterans in the First World War and has also been used recently in the Iran-Iraq war.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government how often this spraying has been going on and if these gases have been sprayed on Prince Edward Island citizens as well.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice.

THE GOVERNMENT

LEGISLATIVE PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES

Hon. John B. Stewart: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question supplementary to the first question that Senator Bonnell asked this afternoon.

I believe honourable senators will have noted over the last few weeks that various announcements have been made that round sums of money are going to be spent over the next five years. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the legislative basis will be for these expenditures? Is the government saying that its intention is to request one-fifth of the amount from Parliament in each of the annual Main Estimates, or will there be, in the case of each program, a bill saying, "This amount of money"—let us say $1 billion—"shall be expended for the following purposes . . ." during the period of five years? How are these announcements to be given legal status? What is the intention?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not sure it is possible for the government to give a reply to that question in general. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to deal with specific cases.

Since the question that gave rise to the honourable senator's question concerns the eligibility of Canadian-service-only veterans for the VIP program, I shall, as an illustration, obtain an answer to the honourable senator's question in respect of that decision.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, my question is further to the one raised by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough). When expenditures are announced for the next five years, since quite specific amounts are always announced, do they say at the same time that the amounts will be indexed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again, it is very difficult to give you a general answer. But regarding the veterans' program in question, I would be glad to get an answer and to table it within a few days.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, today, as I was driving towards the airport in my home area in Prince Edward Island, I noticed several workmen taking up the railway ties. Apparently, no longer can we ship our potatoes and our produce by rail because the rails are being lifted. I also read in the newspaper when I arrived in Ottawa that last night, in a by-election speech in Alma, the Prime Minister promised approximately $50 million to complete a road link between Lac St. Jean and James Bay.

• (1440)

Would the minister be able to tell me—because we are losing our rails, and all the 18-wheeler tractor-trailers that will be travelling on our roads in Prince Edward Island will be breaking up our light pavement, because we have no heavy soil or rock—how many million dollars we can expect in Prince Edward Island to assist us in the construction and reconstruction of our highway system?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend will be aware, perhaps, that there is now in force a $40 million transportation agreement between the federal government and the Government of Prince Edward Island, an ERDA subagreement which expires at the end of next March. He will also be pleased, I trust, to know that I shall be meeting with Premier Ghiz on Thursday of this week to discuss with the premier, his officials and other ministers the possible renewal of the transportation agreement as of April 1, 1988, and the wider transportation problems of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Bonnell: I want to thank the minister for that answer and tell him that, when he is down there, I hope he will realize that Prince Edward Island is the only province in Canada without rail. All our transportation will be by road. Therefore, the province will have to receive much greater support from the federal government to maintain the road system. I hope he will open his heart, as well as the federal government's purse, to ensure that at least 90 per cent of the construction costs are paid by the federal government.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I wish to supplement that question from my colleague from Prince Edward Island.

Senator Marshall: Was there an answer?

Senator Macquarrie: There was no answer forthcoming, as a matter of fact, and I do not think there need be one, but there may be one for my perceptive question.

In light of the fact that the present government has committed itself to the most modern, expensive and most up-to-date communication between Wood Islands and Pictou County, and considering that the present government has also committed itself to the most careful study of a sympathetic reaction to a permanent link and has also made important suggestions as to the improvement of highways in the province, would it not be incumbent upon me to ask the minister to convey to those ministers who are not in his department that most of us on Prince Edward Island think that that is a good step, considering that transportation has been one of our most important problems for many years, and which was especially exacerbated when Pierre Elliott Trudeau decided that—

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Macquarrie: —we would not have the causeway?

Senator Steuart: Partisanship!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a very impressive record indeed. Only my modesty forbade me from going into more detail when I replied to Senator Bonnell's question!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

June 14, 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gerald Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 14th day of June, 1988, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Barootes).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to speak on this matter.

June 14, 1988

Last week, when Senator Barootes asked to adjourn this debate, I pointed out that we wanted to complete the debate on second reading of this bill and send it to committee so that the divergent views on the two sides of the house could be examined by the committee.

During the debate it has been clear that some honourable senators feel that the statistics support one point of view while others think that they do not. That is why we were hoping that this bill would be sent to committee. I indicated then that we would be asking for a vote on the bill this week and would not support any further motions for adjournment.

On Thursday I received a memorandum from Senator Barootes, which is not marked confidential—and I see no reason why he would have wanted it to be confidential—in which he says:

RE: S-15

Unfortunately I have several commitments in Regina next week and would consider it a personal favour if you would hold off on S-15 until I return to the Senate chamber the week of June 20, 1988.

Senator Steuart: He is doing more research!

Senator Frith: Knowing Senator Barootes' attitude to this bill, I am not sure whether the prefix "un", which appears before the word "fortunately", was not there by mistake. However, let us assume that he considers it unfortunate that he is unable to be here to speak to this bill. I am prepared to make that assumption. But I am also assuming that he will understand that we do not want to be discourteous to him, but that we did want to have this bill referred to committee this week. So I hope that he will come back not just during the week of June 20 but on June 20, so we can actually deal with the bill then. We shall be asking that the bill be put to a vote on second reading next Tuesday. We shall also oppose any motions for adjournment at that time.

• (1450)

Senator MacDonald: What committee?

Senator Frith: We shall have to discuss that, but probably to the "idle committee" of Banking, Trade and Commerce, as you have described it.

Senator Doody: We may have to wait a few weeks to determine that.

Senator Frith: If you have any ideas, you have a week to intervene.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the order stand, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

MONTREAL TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Michel Coggier moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to authorize the Montreal Trust Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

He said: Honourable senators, before discussing fully the rationale of Bill S-17, I would like to retrace briefly the history of the companies which form the Montreal Trust group.

[English]

Montreal Trust began its operations in 1889 by a special act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. For almost 90 years Montreal Trust developed its business in Quebec and across Canada under this incorporation.

In 1978 the Montreal Trust Company of Canada was incorporated under the Trust Companies Act of Canada as a subsidiary of the Montreal Trust Company. This company was established to assume, over time, much of the business of Montreal Trust outside Quebec, to develop new markets in the rest of Canada and to diversify the operations of Montreal Trust. In practice, both the Montreal Trust Company and the Montreal Trust Company of Canada have operated out of the same branch network under the name "Montreal Trust". The head office is in Montreal.

In a corporate reorganization in 1982, both the Montreal Trust Company and the Montreal Trust Company of Canada became wholly-owned subsidiaries of Montreal Trustco Inc., a newly created, federally incorporated public company, 40 per cent of the shares of which are publicly held and traded on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges.

In 1986, Montreal Trustco acquired all the shares of Crédit foncier, a mortgage loan company operating throughout Canada since 1880. On January 1, 1987, Crédit foncier was amalgamated with the Montreal Trust Company by an act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. More recently—in April of this year—Montreal Trustco acquired Roynat Inc., a federally chartered commercial term lending institution.

I would now like to turn to the purpose of the bill before us. Bill S-17, honourable senators, is required to enable the Montreal Trust Company of Canada and the Montreal Trust Company to amalgamate into one trust company. As a first step, however, the Montreal Trust Company of Canada must be continued as a trust company operating under the laws of the province of Quebec.

Under existing federal and provincial legislation, two companies incorporated in different jurisdictions may not at this point merge. Only when Bill S-17 has passed, honourable senators, can Montreal Trust then apply to the Government of Quebec to merge its two trust companies in accordance with the procedure and requirements of the recently passed Quebec Trust Companies Act.

The basic objective of the proposed amalgamation is to create a stronger and more efficient trust company and to solve many of the complexities and disadvantages that have resulted from carrying on throughout Canada the same trust and deposit-taking activities in a two-company structure.

Although Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trust Company of Canada are both licensed to do business across Canada, in practice, Montreal Trust Company has restricted most of its financial intermediary activities to Quebec while Montreal Trust Company of Canada has carried on these same activities throughout the rest of Canada.

The acquisition in 1986 of Crédit foncier has greatly complicated this operational regime. By merging with Crédit foncier, Montreal Trust Company acquired all of Crédit foncier's assets and operations nationwide. Thus, Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trust Company of Canada now both provide a complete range of trust and deposit activities across Canada.

The many inefficiencies and complexities resulting from the existing organizational separation between Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trust Company of Canada will be eliminated as a result of the proposed merger.

Another important objective of the amalgamation is to be able to respond in a better way to the new regulatory environment governing financial institutions in Canada. The new Ontario and Quebec trust companies acts and draft federal legislation dealing with trust and loan companies are based on a number of general principles, including the desire to prohibit business dealings between what are termed "related parties". Under these legislative initiatives, Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trust Company of Canada are deemed to be related parties and are, therefore, generally prohibited from dealing with one another. This new regulatory environment will further complicate and constrain the ability of Montreal Trustco to operate and manage both Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trust Company of Canada as if they were a single company. The proposed amalgamation will remove these existing and future constraints.

In summary, as a result of the proposed merger regulatory supervision will be simplified and more effective. Primary responsibility for regulation of the merged trust company will rest with the Province of Quebec. As honourable senators know, Quebec has a well organized supervisory framework with an excellent reputation. Thus, this eliminates the risk that problems will slip through the cracks as a result of dual supervision. Regulators in the province of Quebec have had jurisdiction over Montreal Trust since 1889, and their knowledge of the company is unsurpassed.

I should also like to add that the proposed amalgamation will in no way reduce existing insurance protection of deposits. Clients' deposits will continue to be protected up to $60,000 inside Quebec by the Quebec Deposit Insurance Board and in the rest of Canada by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Essential to the proposed amalgamation, therefore, is the continuance of the Montreal Trust Company of Canada under the laws of the province of Quebec. Bill S-17 will, when passed, provide that authority. The bill has been approved by the board of directors and shareholders of the Montreal Trust Company of Canada and all legal notification requirements set out in the Rules of the Senate of Canada and the Standing Orders of the House of Commons have been fulfilled.

[Senator Cogger]

Furthermore, the Minister of State for Finance, the Honourable Thomas Hockin, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, Mr. Mackenzie, and the Inspecteur général des institutions financières du Québec, Mr. Bouchard, have been fully informed of Montreal Trust's proposed course of action and have expressed their support for the bill.

In conclusion, honourable senators, Montreal Trustco's plan to amalgamate its two trust companies makes excellent business sense and is, therefore, clearly in the best interests of its shareholders, clients and the general public. Consequently, I urge honourable senators to give swift passage to Bill S-17 so that Montreal Trustco can proceed with its planned amalgamation as soon as possible.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, it is comforting to find myself on the same side as Senator Cogger with respect to this particular bill. I hope that it is a forerunner of the kind of cooperation that will go on in this chamber, but I would not count on it too much.

In any case, I want to associate myself with the remarks that have been presented by Senator Cogger in asking for the support of this chamber for this particular bill. The Montreal Trust Company of Canada, the Montreal Trust Company and Montreal Trustco Inc. of Canada are corporate names for organizations that all provide excellent service to the people of Canada, right across the nation. It has been said on occasion that there are some great namesakes of the city of Montreal: the Montreal Canadiens; the Montreal Expos; the Bank of Montreal and, of course, the Montreal Trust Company—and if Senator Flynn had come from Montreal I would have included him in that list.

There are a few questions that I think should be asked when this legislation goes to committee. It is interesting to notice the trend that seems to be occurring—if it is, indeed, a trend. The fact is that this is the second financial institution that has moved its registration and, essentially, its incorporation from a federal charter to a provincial charter. Some months ago we went through this exercise in relation to the Cooperants, Mutual Life Insurance Society, which changed its charter from a federal charter to a Quebec charter. As I say, it may be interesting for the committee to find out just what the advantages are of being a Quebec financial institution.

Certainly, I agree with Senator Cogger that Quebec supervisory requirements are as good as anywhere in the country. Montreal Trust, as it operates in Quebec, has been one of the best run financial institutions in Canada, and I have no hesitation in saying that. However, I would simply like to know what is happening. Is this indeed the beginning of a trend whereby we shall see many financial institutions considering it to their advantage to be Quebec incorporated—or Ontario, or Saskatchewan incorporated—as opposed to having a federal charter?

At one time, I suppose, financial institutions really felt that their image would be better if they could call themselves, for example, the Montreal Trust Company of Canada; that that somehow had a better ring to it and made the company seem more important. Now we are, perhaps, finding a trend the other way. Whether or not there are changes in tax implications is something that the committee might consider.

All in all, I can say that this very fine trust company must know what it is doing, and I support Senator Cogger in suggesting that this bill go to committee. I would suggest that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is the appropriate committee to consider this matter, which I feel will have the support of that committee and, in due course, of this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cogger, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, for the second reading of the Bill C-51, An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I don't smoke; I quit smoking eight years ago. I don't have a problem, although I am often surrounded by smokers. No one in either my wife's family or mine smokes. In recent years I have noticed fewer people are smoking. Cigarette manufacturers are experiencing an irreversible and regular drop in sales.

In view of these considerations, one would have thought I would wholeheartedly support Bill C-51. I have to say that is not the case. I will not vote against the bill, but I must say this kind of bill annoys me, and it is part of a trend that started a few years ago. The government or Parliament is being asked to intervene in all kinds of areas.

I feel that, as long as the use of tobacco is not prohibited, the state should intervene only for educational purposes, to urge the general public, and especially young people, not to smoke.

In fact, I believe that to a certain extent education has in recent years made some very substantial progress, but I think there is too much pushing right now. I feel the anti-smoking lobby is getting very aggressive, despite the inroads that education and anti-smoking campaigns have made thus far.

I referred earlier to the tendency to ask Parliament to intervene in all kinds of areas, which is rather unusual, because when the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was adopted in 1981, people were saying we should not restrict individual freedoms, the freedom of expression, freedom of action, et cetera.

Since then, on many occasions the courts have declared certain provisions unconstitutional or invalid, in cases often unforeseen by Parliament. The courts tell us not to interfere with the Charter, but on the other hand, there is also a trend towards asking Parliament constantly to intervene.

As for this particular bill, I don't like the provisions that prohibit advertising. I agree the public should be informed, and that cigarette manufacturers should be obliged to provide a clearer and more specific warning that excessive use of tobacco is dangerous to your health. I agree. I feel that legislating this kind of warning might accelerate the process of getting people to stop smoking. Abolition or prohibition may come some day, when we decide that tobacco is so harmful that it should be prohibited on the same grounds as marijuana or other hard drugs. Honourable senators will recall that a joint legislative committee that was appointed came very close to recommending that marijuana not be made legal but taken out of the Criminal Code. That was a step in another direction. Since that time, the anti-smoking lobby has taken a stance that I sometimes find very aggressive and very exaggerated.

I am sure the majority of honourable senators will agree to support Bill C-51. Personally, I would like to say, for the record, that I am annoyed and also concerned that all the banning and prohibiting provided here may contravene the provisions of section 2(b) of the Charter. In any case, I do not look on the present progress of Bill C-51 with any enthusiasm.

[English]

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Spivak speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, in closing the debate I wish to add to the remarks I made in response to a question asked last Tuesday by Senator Thériault. Since then I have had a chance to look at my response in Hansard and I would like briefly to clarify and add to those comments.

Senator Thériault asked a question about advertising. I said that 65 per cent of advertising of tobacco products is now done in American magazines. The correct statement is that 65 per cent of magazines read in Canada are American magazines containing advertisements for American cigarettes. The point is, as I said, that those magazines do not advertise Canadian cigarettes but American cigarettes, which only a small percentage of the Canadian public—less than one per cent—accepts.

Let me briefly expand on the advertising provisions of Bill C-51. The bill will prohibit the following situations in the field of magazine advertising: It will prohibit tobacco product advertisements placed from within Canada in Canadian media. The bill will prohibit tobacco product advertisements from within Canada in foreign media, the latter being eventually received in Canada. It will prohibit tobacco product advertisements being placed from outside Canada in Canadian media and it will also prohibit tobacco product advertisements from being placed from outside Canada in foreign media, the latter being eventually received in Canada. As well, Canadian tobacco manufacturers will be further discouraged from placing tobacco advertisements in American magazines circulated in Canada, because section 19 of the Income Tax Act disallows the advertising tax deduction for such advertisements in U.S. magazines.

I also incorrectly stated, not being exactly perfect—

Senator Doody: Never admit it!

Senator Marshall: But you are close!

Senator Spivak: Yes, I am close to perfect. In any event, I stated that there is a voluntary ban on the advertising of cigarettes in the United States. In fact, it is not a voluntary ban but a legislative ban. We have a voluntary ban in Canada.

Senator Thériault also asked whether the legislation would interfere in any way, now or in the future, with the Free Trade Agreement. I suggested to him that that was not an issue. I would like to expand slightly on that comment and give you a couple of points that were debated in the House committee.

Under the Free Trade Agreement there will be a tariff reduction. The 20 per cent tariff on imported cigarettes will be removed in ten equal instalments, beginning in 1989 and ending in 1999, gradually equalizing the price of U.S. and Canadian cigarettes in Canada. However, U.S. cigarettes have a markedly different taste from Canadian cigarettes and, as I said, they account for less than 1 per cent of cigarette sales in Canada. According to the officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare with whom I have consulted since last Tuesday, tariff reduction is not expected to have any major impact on either Bill C-51 or patterns of tobacco consumption in Canada.

The Free Trade Agreement will relax the definition of "Canadian magazine" by removing the requirement for typesetting and printing in Canada, but the requirement that the magazines be edited and published in Canada to qualify as a Canadian magazine will remain. Again, according to the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the change in definition of "Canadian magazine" is not expected to have a major impact on the application of the proposed Tobacco Products Control Act. Of course, the very detailed provisions in the bill prohibit advertising in the manner just described. I hope this further expansion on Senator Thériault's question about the effect of Bill C-51 on the Free Trade Agreement will be of help to him. I hope, too, that this bill will receive swift passage in this chamber.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

AIR CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE
COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-129 NEGATIVE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-129, An Act to provide for the continuance of Air Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares thereof to the public, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last week Senator MacDonald intervened on this order with a well researched, well organized and, I must say, well delivered and very persuasive argument against the motion I think he intended to support. The report of that speech is found in Debates of the Senate of June 9, 1988, at page 3650.

The first comment Senator MacDonald made was that he wanted to make some supporting remarks to ask his colleagues in this place to agree to a pre-study of Bill C-129, the Air Canada Public Participation Bill. He then mentioned that the bill was debated in the other place on second reading on May 24, May 25, May 27, June 1 and June 3, for a total of five days. He told us that some 20 members spoke during the debate in the other place and that it was then referred to a legislative committee. Those comments may very well have been by way of background and not meant in any way to support the idea of pre-study of the bill. The fact that it was debated in the other place certainly would have no bearing on whether we should do so here.

The next point he made—again for background, I take it—was that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was idle at the moment. He said that it was eager to have the bill referred to it for pre-study. I am not certain of the basis upon which that statement was made. I take it that since Senator MacDonald is the deputy chairman of that committee he has a sense of that being the case. I do not know of any resolution to that effect from the committee; if there were such a resolution, I am sure he would have stated it.

Then, in support of this motion, he went on to give several reasons against pre-study. He said:

... it is a basic principle of British parliamentary procedure that a bill must be dealt with consequently in both houses.

I am sure he did not mean to say "consequently"; I am sure he meant "consecutively". He then pointed out the practical reasons for that. He said:

Why would one house bother to consider a bill introduced in the other place and not yet adopted therein? Presumably, it would be a waste of time for this house to better a proposal that, in the final instance, was to be rejected by the other. Hence, no house is to undertake pre-study of a bill introduced in the other without having been informed by message that the particular bill has been adopted in the house where it was first introduced.

That is the first reason Senator MacDonald gives for not having a pre-study.

Presuming that the background remarks I referred to were not meant to be reasons for not having a pre-study, the second reason Senator MacDonald gives against pre-study, which he describes as a "disadvantage", is that it may be that the exact contribution of the Senate to the legislative process becomes somewhat blurred, at least for the outsider. There is no formal acknowledgement by the Commons of the senatorial input. He said that was a point put to him very strongly by Senator McElman. Senator McElman, Senator MacDonald and I agree very strongly on that point. I think that is the view of other senators also, because I can remember many occasions when, after a pre-study of some months, a bill was then passed and we were accused of rubber stamping it because we had passed it when it was returned after pre-study.

Still on the reasons against this motion, Senator MacDonald gave a third reason, when he said:

Another possible drawback is that the Senate could waste its time in suggesting hundreds of amendments to a bill that will never reach the floor of the Senate because the House will later reject it at third reading.

Honourable senators, that is also a very persuasive reason for not having pre-study.

Then, to make sure we are in no doubt as to where Senator MacDonald stands on these reasons against his motion, he said that "These are all valid reasons..." He then said, "...I know of no other way to explain the recent reluctance to refer the subject-matter of a bill to the appropriate committee." Honourable senators, those three reasons as to why there should not be pre-study, all advanced by him, sound pretty good to me.

He then went into a scholarly dissertation—and I do not say that sarcastically—of the research he had done on the trends. He drew contrasts between certain periods when the idea of pre-study was first very popular, then gained popularity and then lost popularity. The result of this study is, it seems to me, to show that in certain periods the idea of pre-study was becoming routine and that reference to a committee for pre-study was becoming almost automatic and, of course, represented a reversal of what he had earlier described as a "basic principle of parliamentary procedure."

He then studied these trends of popularity and referred to the diffusion of the use of this procedure between 1971 and 1979.

At page 3651 he referred to a third trend, when he said:

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to develop any lengthy reasons to show that the advantages of this procedure are obvious.

I can understand that, because he did list a number of strong disadvantages to the procedure. When it came to listing the advantages, apparently he ran out.

In the next paragraph, he said:

I suggest that the chamber might occasionally have a voice in the decision to refer a bill so that, if it is not referred—and there may, indeed, be valid reasons for that...

He, himself, in fact, listed a long number of reasons why we ought not to do it. He went on to say:

...at least there would be a formal record of the reasons.

That, honourable senators, was the most articulate and persuasive reason that I found in all of his interventions to support the fact that the whole practice has gotten out of hand, because, if you notice, Senator MacDonald now reverses the onus. The parliamentary tradition that he honoured in the first part of his speech, that is, consecutive dealing with bills, is now subverted so that Senator MacDonald thinks that we, the rest of us in the chamber, should accept the onus of explaining why there should not be pre-study. The assumption is that there will always be pre-study. The tradition has gone. The onus is on us to resist pre-study and to explain why we should follow the traditions of Parliament.

He then went on to say:

...the questions I put to my colleagues are: Is the procedure known as "pre-study" up for re-examination?

He did not ask: Is Parliamentary tradition up for re-examination? He asked: Is pre-study up for re-examination? He went on further to ask:

• (1530)

Is it being discouraged or is it being eliminated? If not, is it to be restricted to those bills that are complex, technical and do not raise deep party issues?

Again, the onus is changed. The question Senator MacDonald asks is: Why are we not following pre-study instead of normal procedures? The onus is on those who want to follow the tradition to explain why they want to do things in the well established and proper way. And, honourable senators, if that is not enough, he adds:

Because most bills that we handle have secured the support of the elected representatives of the people, the House of Commons expects quick approval of them.

Is that a reason for the Senate not to do its job? Are we not to do our proper job because the elected representatives of the people, the members of the House of Commons, expect quick approval? Senator MacDonald then says that, because the other place expects that quick approval, scores of bills are sent to the Senate in the final days of the session and senators are expected to adopt them quickly and without changes. Honourable senators, is that a reason to change the parliamentary tradition that Senator MacDonald, himself, has researched and put forward?

The honourable senator proceeded further to say:

Let me add that just because a bill has been the subject of pre-study does not mean that I would for one moment suggest that it ought not to receive further study.

Perhaps he would not, but his leader would. His leader did, for example, on Bill C-22. He told us that we ought not to proceed with regular study of that bill because it had already been pre-studied; and he spent a good deal more than "a moment" in doing so.

Honourable senators, no reason whatever has been put forward to reverse the tradition. I think we should put a stop right now to the concept that the onus is on those opposing pre-study to demonstrate why there should be no pre-study—a tradition for which, as Senator MacDonald himself has said, there are abundant good reasons. Honourable senators, Senator MacDonald is an urbane, intelligent and open-minded person. Because he is all of those things, I invite him to join us in defeating his motion for the reasons he put forward.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator MacDonald speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I shall move later today that two more bills be pre-studied, so I am sure that the arguments put forward by Senator Frith will apply equally to them.

As to my first point—the suggestion that, traditionally, bills should be studied consecutively—I probably should have added that, arguably, that worked best in a more balanced bicameral atmosphere or that, arguably, it works perfectly when both chambers are dominated by the same party. The honourable senator did not quote the conclusion drawn by the Joint Committee on Senate Reform. Why would he have left out, in referring to my remarks of the other day, the reference to the report of that distinguished joint committee? Here is what was stated at page 38 in reference to the suspensive veto:

The use of a suspensive veto would supplement rather than displace what is called the pre-study procedure. Pre-study is a most useful arrangement whereby the Senate can begin its consideration of the subject matter of a bill before it has received third reading in the House of Commons, thereby giving the Senate legislative input without formally amending the bill and without risking confrontation. The Senate achieves this input by communicating its views to the House informally. Pre-study should be continued.

Honourable senators, we shall always have matters to deal with at the eleventh hour. Otherwise, the House of Commons would have to stop operating months before we did so that we could eventually catch up with their work by the time the

[Senator Frith.]

Standing Orders caused us to adjourn. That would be the only way to avoid complaints of last minute rushes with respect to legislation. We shall always have matters to deal with at the last minute.

Senator Frith: Why? Let us deal with them.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the honourable senator a question? What is wrong with continuing our session, as we did last year, to complete the work that we receive in the last days of June? What is wrong with sitting in July, as we did on the transportation bill and on Bill C-22? That seems to me to be the sensible alternative, because both houses cannot operate simultaneously.

Senator MacDonald: Senator MacEachen, there are many examples of situations in which both houses have operated simultaneously and to good effect. I think I mentioned one example: the reference of the subject matter of the security intelligence legislation to a special committee chaired by Senator Pitfield. The report of that committee caused approximately 100 amendments to be made to a bill that had been pre-studied. That is often referred to as a great example of the usefulness of pre-study.

Senator Frith: Yes, and we worked all summer long on that.

Senator MacDonald: Some people, I suppose, like this place well enough to hang around here 12 months of the year. I sat on at least one committee that worked last summer. We dealt with fairly simple, straightforward legislation. I remember that Senator Stewart attended those meetings more religiously than most. We could have eliminated the necessity to sit in the summer if we had pre-studied those bills.

Honourable senators, I am not trying to put the onus on anybody. However, I have to say that I get somewhat miffed when I read in the press remarks senators have made with respect to what is going on here, when discussions were never held in the chamber. I do not agree with informal meetings between leaders and deputy leaders on matters such as the referral of the subject matter of a bill for pre-study. I feel it is possible that the recent reluctance to refer the subject matter of this bill for pre-study is largely due to the personality of the leadership of the opposition. I have reason to believe that that view is shared by some senators opposite. If pre-study is dead, and if all Liberal senators agree it is dead, then there is nothing more to be said. However, it is passing strange that something that has been around for so many years and considered to be so useful has now suddenly disappeared from the Senate. I find it very strange.

I do not really have a great deal more to offer, except to say that, without being too much of a nuisance, every time there is a lull in the conversation it is my intention to put forward a motion for the pre-study of a bill. After a suitable interval has elapsed, I shall ask for a vote. If the reasons that are given today are not enlarged upon, unless we hear some new reasons, we shall at least have a record. We shall know that the Senate of Canada is no longer engaged in this practice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Robertson:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-129, An Act to provide for the continuance of Air Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares thereof to the public, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifty-fifth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented on Thursday, June 9, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended to move the adoption of this report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. It deals with supplementary budgets of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, but it includes an amount for that committee's examination of Bill S-4, to amend the Hazardous Products Act.

As I recall the situation—and the chairman of the committee can correct me if I am wrong—a package of budget items included some items for activities of the committee about studies that were already under way and therefore did not need any special reference. Those budgets were approved, and then this part dealing with Bill S-4 was included in the package.

Bill S-4 was Senator Haidasz's bill, which has been withdrawn. So I suggest that we adopt the report, making the appropriate deletions of that portion of the budget that deals with Bill S-4. If that suggestion makes sense, I shall ask for the support of the chairman of the committee. If it does not, then I shall adjourn the matter until we have a report that is satisfactory to him and to his committee.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would be happy to have the report adopted. However, I would point out that the budget apportioned for the study of Bill S-4, if I remember correctly, was not very significant; in other words, it was a very small budget.

Senator Frith: It was $11,800.

Senator Tremblay: Yes, $11,800. As Senator Frith has just mentioned, there were several matters that were already on the table at the time Bill S-4 was added, and I do not remember that any specific amount was allocated to Bill S-4, but perhaps I am wrong. Perhaps my memory is not serving me correctly.

I agree that we should follow the suggestion of Senator Frith. However, if there are significant amounts relating to the study of Bill S-4, the budget should be corrected accordingly; but I am quite sure that the amount is not really significant.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the best thing to do is to refer the matter back to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and ask that committee to amend the report, taking into account the fact that Bill S-4 has been withdrawn. If we do that, it will give Senator Tremblay and his clerk a chance to look at it with the Internal Economy Committee, and we might have it back to the Senate by Thursday afternoon, if there are no problems.

Report withdrawn.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-51 WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-51, An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if you recall, as the text shows clearly, the effect of the motion I then proposed was to refer Bill C-51 to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for preliminary study. This was justified at the time because Bill S-4 had also been referred and, since the subject of the two bills was similar, it seemed to me that they should be considered at the same time.

Now it so happens that this very afternoon we referred Bill C-51 to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology according to the regular procedure, so that I think this motion can be withdrawn from the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is permission granted, honourable senators?

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL TRADE TRIBUNAL ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILLS C-110 AND C-121—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 9, 1988, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-110, An Act to establish the Canadian International Trade Tribunal and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof, and the subject-matter of the Bill C-121, An Act to authorize the reorganization and divestiture of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bills coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, it is our displeasure.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator MacDonald, are you going to speak?

Senator Frith: If I can quote you, I believe that this is one of those motions where you are going to be, not too much of a nuisance, just a bit of a nuisance.

Senator Doody: This is the urbane gentleman.

Senator MacDonald: I think we have plowed a sufficient number of furrows this afternoon on the matter of pre-study, so I should like to have the matter adjourned.

Senator Doody: You can adjourn it yourself.

Senator MacDonald: Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: Even lost causes are entitled to champions.

On motion of Senator MacDonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gerald Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act (Bill C-117, Chapter 18, 1988)

An Act to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act (Bill C-127, Chapter 19, 1988)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 15, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE NOT AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Leave is not granted!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the absence of a motion to the contrary, we shall be sitting tomorrow at 2 o'clock. Looking at the order paper, we seem to have cleaned up most of our business. I wonder what business the government has for tomorrow.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have the order paper that is before us. I do not agree with Senator Frith that the order paper is cleaned up. We have pages of items here which have been stood, many of them for a long while. It seems to me that tomorrow might be an appropriate day to deal with some of these, if not most of these.

The business of the government is still ongoing. There are several bills before committees. This would be a great opportunity for those committees to meet. We can adjourn early tomorrow afternoon, if it is not the wish of the Senate to continue with the items on the order paper. The committees can then meet and deal with the various bills before them.

Bill C-52 and Bill C-105 are before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. Bill C-77, the emergencies legislation, is before a Committee of the Whole. The victims of crime legislation bill is before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Bill C-103, the ACOA bill, is before the Finance Committee; the railway legislation, Bill C-105, is before the Transportation Committee, and Bill C-115 is before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

It seems to me that tomorrow would be a great opportunity for some of these bills to be studied. It would be advantageous to all of us if, on days when there was not much legislation before the house, the Senate could adjourn so that the committees could get on with their work. However, our experience in the past has been that it is sometimes difficult for committees to get a quorum or to continue with their business when the Senate is not sitting. It is unfortunate that we should all have to come back to accommodate the committees, but, in the absence of that endeavour by the committees, I see no alternative.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was asking about government business; I did not hear the Deputy Leader of the Government refer to any government business for tomorrow. Let us deal with that first. There is no reason for the Senate to sit tomorrow as far as government business is concerned.

The next question concerns other items on the order paper. If senators want to deal with business on the order paper that is not government business, I assume they will let us know. I am sure the Senate would be prepared to accommodate them, if there were enough business to justify the Senate's sitting for that purpose.

Most of the intervention by the Deputy Leader of the Government related to committee work. We have been over this road very often and I do not think that we should ever let this go by again: we must link committee meetings with meetings of the Senate. I thought we had made a lot of progress in that direction, and, in fact, I have frequently, particularly in the last year, attended meetings of committees when the Senate was not sitting.

I do not think we should yield quite so readily as the Deputy Leader of the Government would have us—I do not accuse him of doing this in general, but in his intervention today—to the excuse that committees will not meet if the Senate is not sitting and that senators will not attend committee meetings if the Senate is not sitting.

I do not think it is acceptable for senators to raise that as an excuse. Certainly, no senator can raise that with me. Obviously, if the government insists, we are going to be here even if the government has nothing for us to do. And I take it from the intervention that was made that we are all to be here tomorrow for the meetings of some committees. Those committees that have provided for meetings tomorrow, assuming that we were going to sit tomorrow, are Fisheries, Legal and Constitutional Affairs and Internal Economy. The Fisheries Committee is sitting in New Brunswick, and will sit whether the Senate sits or not, I assume—or are we going to carry this to such ridiculous lengths that we will advise them that the Senate is not sitting so that they will not meet in New Brunswick?

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will be meeting on Bill C-89; the chairman of that committee just asked for leave to meet this afternoon. Leave was not given; so I assume that committee is eager, to use Senator MacDonald's words, to meet tomorrow.

There is also the Internal Economy Committee. The Internal Economy Committee has often met when the Senate was not sitting, and I know it will tomorrow.

Obviously, however, we are going to be here because the Deputy Leader of the Government has decided that we will sit tomorrow; but I think an objection should be placed on the record every time there is no government business for us, and no indication that anyone else wants to go on with other business, that we should nevertheless sit because we are worried about committees not sitting.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, first let me say that I am reassured and favourably disposed to the comments Senator Frith has made. The idea of emphasizing to the committees the importance of their meeting, whether the Senate is sitting or not, is reassuring to me. I find that it would make life in this place a great deal more pleasant and far more productive if we could get an arrangement that would guarantee the meetings of committees, whether the Senate is sitting or not.

As honourable senators will appreciate, we have gone a long way down the road towards trying to institute a program of scheduling committee meetings while the Senate is not sitting. We have gone far and beyond anything that was ever done before, to my knowledge, in trying to get that program into place. I have to report that in many instances it has worked; in many instances it has not worked. I have heard—and perhaps I am the only one who has—some honourable senators say, "I am not coming all the way back to Ottawa just to attend a committee meeting."

● (1410)

In any event, if we could have some assurance that the committees would meet and deal with the business before them during the adjournment of the Senate, then I could not agree more with Senator Frith that there would be no need for the Senate to sit. My first obligation is to see that government business is attended to. I note that tomorrow, Thursday, there are no committee meetings scheduled at this point.

Senator Frith: Tomorrow?

Senator Doody: Tomorrow afternoon or tomorrow evening there are no scheduled committee meetings. Correct me if I am wrong.

Senator Frith: I do not know of any.

Senator Doody: That is the problem I have, too. If committee chairmen want to meet tomorrow to deal with government business, the Senate can just as easily not sit. But I just cannot ask the Senate to adjourn so that each individual senator can go about his private affairs while the business of the government is still sitting on the order paper, whether it is before a committee or whether it is dealt with actively in the chamber. If we could get some cooperation from committee chairmen and committee members, then I would be most pleased to accommodate the Senate in that respect.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I just want to add that tomorrow at noon the Steering Committee on National Finance will meet to discuss the order of business of the committee and to decide how to deal with the legislation before us and whom to call as witnesses. That committee will meet whether the house is sitting or not.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, specifically, I know of three committees that will meet tomorrow. As deputy chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, I know that it will meet tomorrow.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: And there is the joint session of Parliament.

Senator Frith: Yes, and because of the joint session of Parliament the Internal Economy Committee is meeting at 9 o'clock. Is that the reason the Senate is sitting tomorrow? Is it because of the joint session of Parliament that is taking place in the morning?

Senator Doody: I did not say that.

Senator Frith: Senator Doody has not raised that as a reason; so I will not raise it, either.

We know that the Internal Economy Committee will meet; it is my understanding that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will meet, and Senator Leblanc's committee is going to meet.

Hon. David Walker: That is a meeting of the steering committee.

Senator Frith: So what? What has that got to do with the Senate's being here? It is the linkage of the Senate's sittings with the committee meetings that I think we have to stop. If senators opposite have business for us here tomorrow, of course we will be here. But I think we have to stop blurring the line between reasons for the Senate to sit and reasons for the committees to meet. In this case there is no evidence of any problem with committees that have planned meetings or with committees that want to plan meetings.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am not trying to blur any lines at all. I thought I was being most explicit. If the committees will undertake to meet and deal with government business, then there is no need for the Senate to sit. There is no blurring of the lines there; it is straightforward. I can only quote the experience and history we have had over the past months, which does not support the theory that the committees will meet when the Senate is not sitting. We have tried that over and over again. Sometimes it happens, but we cannot depend upon it. More often than not we cannot get a quorum; this or that person cannot make it and it ends up that the committee does not meet. I would love to correct that situation.

Senator Frith: But there is no evidence of that for tomorrow.

Senator Doody: Well, tomorrow is your exception. Give us a guarantee that we can get the committees to work and we will work out a new deal.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, in entering this discussion I am not directing myself to tomorrow but to the question generally. I wish to say, in support of the proposition that the Senate should not have to sit in order for committees to meet, that I have made arrangements for my committee to meet during two full weeks in July—if I could have the attention of the Deputy Leader of the Government.

An Hon. Senator: He has a short attention span.

Senator van Roggen: My staff made arrangements for witnesses, and so on, on the assumption that the Senate would not be sitting in July, as it usually would not be. My hope is that my committee will be able to meet for two different weeks in July in order to deal with the free trade question. We would be doing work in one week that we would normally get done in two months if we were restricted to our allotted spot. I will have to change those arrangements if the Senate will be sitting all the time.

I say that to give you an example of the work that can be planned by a committee if the Senate is not sitting.

Senator Doody: Senator van Roggen, that is music to my ears. It is an absolute delight to know that we will continue with the work of the Senate during the month of July.

It was my hope that the committees would deal with the government business we now have before us and that with some effort and cooperation we could finish what we have before us by the end of June. Those committees that were not finished could continue to meet and the Senate could recess until other business was ready from the other place. Those are the sorts of arrangements I would like to make. Those are the sorts of arrangements I have broached and suggested on several occasions.

Nothing has come back to me to indicate that that is a possibility. We do not have the numbers to enforce what I would consider a reasonable program for the Senate in relationship to its business.

Senator Haidasz: Fill the vacancies!

Senator Doody: If I could create a few vacancies, that would be more appropriate!

If we could work along a line that seems sensible and reasonable, we would all be beneficiaries. Let us work to clear up what we have before us, clue up at the end of June, and come back when there is more business ready for us. That does not seem to be an improper or an impractical suggestion, but I have had no indication that that is acceptable.

Senator van Roggen: I cannot speak for my leader, but as far as my committee is concerned that is the program I am working on.

Senator Doody: We are very pleased to get that report, senator.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: From whom did Senator Doody understand that that would not be acceptable, that we would be prepared to be here and deal with government business, including the summer?

Senator Doody: I did not say that at all. I said we should clear up what is now on the order paper.

Senator Frith: Let me make this clear. We are willing to work—through the summer, if necessary—if the work is here.

Senator Doody: We are willing to work as well. Please contain yourself, Senator Frith. Do not get exercised now.

Senator Frith: Why not? Exercise is good for you.

Senator Doody: There is no need for us to get overheated. I know we are experiencing an early, humid heatwave, but, nevertheless, we should try to control ourselves.

I have suggested that we work toward cluing up, finishing up, including the business that is before the Senate now, hopefully by the end of June, although perhaps that is not practical, after which we could recess and await further business from the other place. At no time did I suggest that the Senate was not prepared to deal with the business sent to it. At no time did I make that suggestion. However, if the honourable senators are overly sensitive, there is little I can do about it.

Senator Frith: What do you have for us tomorrow?

Senator Doody: There is a whole order paper here.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

STUDENT DELEGATION FROM THORNHILL, ONTARIO

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in the South Gallery of a delegation of students—Theresa Scaini, Carmen Lopez, and Warren Ho—from St. Robert's Catholic High School, Thornhill, Ontario. They are here to present a petition to Mr. Anthony Roman, the member for York North, on pro-life. This petition numbers approximately 3,500 signatures.

On behalf of honourable senators, I welcome them to Ottawa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday a press report indicated that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the Honourable Gerry Weiner, had planned to meet with representatives of the redress committee representing Canadians of Japanese descent.

In light of the action recently taken by the United States Congress that approved individual compensation to Americans of Japanese descent for acts taken by the American government during World War II, has the Government of Canada now reconsidered its previous policy respecting individual compensation to Canadians of Japanese descent for acts taken by the Government of Canada during and following World War II?

• (1420)

PAROLE PENITENTIARIES

INCLUSION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION IN LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and pertains to a statement made this morning by his colleague the Solicitor General.

I do not know whether it is the Ottawa heat that causes Solicitors General to act in such a bizarre manner, but it seems to be a regular summer occurrence in that portfolio, because the statements by the Solicitor General seem to be a replay of what happened in 1986, when Parliament was recalled.

The Solicitor General announced sweeping reforms this morning to the Parole Act and Penitentiary Act—I submit, in simple surrender to the looney fringe of that party, for political purposes only.

Will these reforms and the bill the minister is to introduce be part of the government's legislative package that must be dealt with by Parliament prior to the summer adjournment?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that would be a matter that my colleague the Deputy Prime Minister would have to address. I am not sure what priority, in terms of the legislative schedule in the other place, these measures would have, but I will make inquiries and see what information I can usefully bring to the attention of the Senate. I cannot forbear, however, to remark briefly upon the honourable senator's preamble.

The reforms announced this morning by my colleague, Mr. Kelleher, the Solicitor General, are, first, to increase the time that all federal inmates must serve before becoming eligible for parole; and, second, to replace the system of earned remission, where inmates can presently receive up to one-third of their sentences off for good behaviour, with a shorter statutory release period.

The honourable senator must surely be aware that these policy changes announced by my colleague this morning are in response to widespread and justifiable concerns on the part of the Canadian people concerning the penal system in this country and their own security.

Senator Hastings: I have a supplementary question. Having regard to the minister's statement that the bill proposes to lengthen the time an inmate will spend in custody, I should like to remind him that it was just two years ago that his government brought forward legislation to lessen the time an inmate spent in custody, and it brought Parliament back from a summer recess to pass legislation that had to be passed, because there were 22 dangerous inmates about to be released.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Hastings: The Prime Minister said 44 and the new Solicitor General said 84. It took you four months to find 22, after you had lugged Parliament back here to pass that legislation in the interests of public safety. You now say that you will lengthen the time that we will keep them in custody—"throw away the key" legislation. After you brought us back here two years ago to make the day parole eligibility shorter and the time in custody to be eligible for it one-sixth, you will increase it to one month prior to the eligibility date. In other words, you are going to take a slash at the inmates for your own political purposes.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are going to embark on the first major, overall reform of the system of conditional release in 25 years. That is, as I say, in response to widespread and justifiable public concern about the security of the public. I believe—in fact, I am confident—that the vast majority of the Canadian people will be very supportive of the reforms that were announced this morning by my colleague the Solicitor General. If Senator Hastings wishes to categorize the vast majority of the Canadian public as lunatics, that, of course, is his privilege.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In using that expression, I referred to that fringe of your party; that lunatic fringe that wanted to hang people. That is the fringe that, in my opinion, you are appealing to.

Honourable senators, I have a final supplementary question. A vast majority of the people, in my opinion, would like to see the return of the whip and the stockade. Can we look forward to those items being part of the legislation?

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

REQUEST FOR GRAMMATICALLY CORRECT FRENCH TEXT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand he may ask to respond later and I appreciate his willingness to provide an answer.

I am referring to page 177 of the French text of The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, Subsection (e), Paragraph 15 of Article 1904. I tried to understand the meaning of this text and asked legal experts to explain it to me but they too were unable to clear it up for me. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate might provide me with an explanation. The English version is of little help to me. Here is how the French text reads:

Chaque partie modifiera ses lois ou règlements de telle sorte que ses tribunaux assurent, au regard de toute personne relevant de sa compétence, la pleine exécution des sanctions que l'autre Partie impose en vertu de sa législation afin de faire respecter les engagements ou ordonnances conservatoires qu'elle accepte ou promulgue pour permettre, aux fins de l'examen par un groupe spécial ou de la procédure de contestation extraordinaire, la communication de renseignements confidentiels, personnels et commerciaux de nature exclusive et autres renseignements protégés;

Perhaps a few grammatical errors make the text somewhat muddled. I would like to have a corrected version.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know if my friend belongs to the French Academy but in any event I accept his comments concerning the so-called grammatical errors in the text.

The honourable senator would know that the text is now before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I would strongly urge him to bring his questions and comments on the meaning and scope of the text to the attention of the committee. Undoubtedly he will have an opportunity to raise such questions before the people who drafted the agreement or who are responsible for it.

Senator Gigantès: Is the honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggesting that, if an error is found in this clause while the matter is before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, the government will see that it is corrected?

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator is talking about grammatical errors, of course we shall take every measure required to correct such errors in the bill now before Parliament.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING TO MAINLAND—SUBMISSION OF PROPOSALS—NAMES OF COMPANIES OR CONSORTIA—FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—NATURE OF PROPOSALS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I understand that yesterday the government announced that proposals had been received in relation to the project for a fixed crossing in the Northumberland Strait between Prince Edward Island and

[Senator Gigantès.]

New Brunswick. I wonder if the minister would undertake to provide the Senate with the names of the companies or consortia that submitted proposals, an analysis of each of the proposals—

Senator Flynn: Order paper!

Senator Stewart: I am sorry; I did not hear the honourable senator.

Senator Flynn: I said, "Order paper!"

Senator Stewart: The honourable senator wants an order paper.

Senator Frith: Give the man a paper!

Senator Flynn: No, no. I am saying that your question should be put on the order paper.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, if this were a question about an important project in Quebec, Senator Flynn would be eager to have information given to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I would put my question on the order paper!

Senator Frith: Come on, Jacques! How many questions did you ever in your life—ever in your life—put on the order paper?

Senator Stewart: However, since my question concerns Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and the men who fish in Northumberland Strait, he is entirely disinterested. He says, "Order paper."—so that we can get an answer in six months, when it will be irrelevant to the concerns of the people there.

Senator Flynn: Are you basing your experience on the former government's behaviour?

Senator Stewart: Why is he taking up the time of the Senate?

Senator McElman: I see that your sunny personality is back, Jacques. Where were you when we needed you?

Senator Stewart: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is more sensitive to the interests of the people in Prince Edward Island and the fishermen in the area than Senator Flynn is. I ask the Leader of the Government to provide the lists I have mentioned and, also, whether he can tell us—not in great detail, of course—about the kind of financing arrangements set forth in each of the proposals. It would also be useful to know if it is true that only one of the proposals does not involve either a bridge or a causeway segment. As the minister knows, a bridge segment or a causeway segment threatens the fishing industry—at least, many of the people there believe that it does—so it would be helpful to have that information.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall table what information I properly can on that matter, and to that end I shall make inquiries of my colleague, the Honourable Stewart McInnes, Minister of Public Works.

Senator Stewart: I thank the minister for his courteous response.

An Hon. Senator: What do you say to that, Jacques?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Flynn: At least the leader's response has imposed silence on Senator Stewart.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether this week we will learn the government's plans for dealing with livestock producers in the drought-stricken areas of the prairie provinces?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I shall have to make inquiries.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-204, An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.—(Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C.)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this particular bill is before us for third reading. It has been brought to my attention that there appears to be a real or perceived difficulty with the wording of the bill. In that light, perhaps it would be in the best interests of the Senate, and of this piece of legislation, if we were to hold it here and not give it third reading until such time as the committee reports back with Bill C-51.

Bill C-51 and Bill C-204 are very much related. Indeed, on page 7 of Bill C-204 honourable senators will find that subclause 9(2) is a conditional amendment that depends on the passage of Bill C-51. It seems to me that we would be better served by awaiting the arrival of Bill C-51 and seeing how the Senate wishes to deal with it.

I am also told that there are some other, minor difficulties with the bill, and, although they may not be all that important, I still feel that, in the interests of our turning out a proper product, it might be wise to take our time and give it some thought.

Also in clause 9, reference is made in subclause (1), Schedule I of Part II, which would add No. 5 to the schedule.

5. Products manufactured from tobacco and intended for use by smoking, inhalation or mastication . . .

However, I am told that that will not be the wording of No. 5, because several other products have been added to the hazardous products list by Order in Council; rather, this may bear a closer resemblance to No. 40 or No. 41.

In any event, I think it would be in the best interests of the proper form of this legislation if we were to hold out until such time as the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has had an opportunity to deal with Bill C-51.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the desire to have this bill not passed now because of difficulties with its wording or its linkage with Bill C-51 has me somewhat concerned; I hope that concern is misplaced.

The Deputy Leader of the Government was courteous enough to tell me that he had received some information concerning difficulties with this bill. He did not outline here all of the difficulties he mentioned when he spoke to me. They apparently involve some problems that departments have with the wording of some of the proposed sections.

Although I have not done a lot of deep research into this subject, I have an interest in it, as honourable senators know, and I recall that this bill did undergo a clause-by-clause study in the other place and that many of the proposed sections were actually written by government departments—the same departments that are now concerned that the bill ought not to pass because the wording is not correct. Apparently, in many cases they are worried about the wording that they themselves proposed and had passed in the clause-by-clause study in the other place.

Then, honourable senators, I link that with, admittedly, a rumour that certain persons and lobbyists opposing this bill have been assured that the bill will not pass.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: If I link the fact that many of these departments are now saying we should wait and not pass this bill until we satisfy ourselves of some concern about the wording—the very departments who were involved in the clause-by-clause consideration—with the fact that it is well known that there are persons of political influence who do not want this bill to pass, I am concerned that someone might be trying to put something over on the Deputy Leader of the Government, because I know he would not try to put anything over on us.

Senator Stewart: Never!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: This is not your bill; this is a private bill.

Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator Flynn would explain that remark.

Senator Flynn: Senator Frith seems to think that this is the bill put forward from his side of the chamber.

Senator Frith: I never said that.

Senator Flynn: Senator Frith mentioned "onus".

Senator Frith: I said, "on us"—on the Senate—including Senator Flynn.

May I proceed? Please feel free to raise other points, especially if they are as silly as that one.

Honourable senators, I raise these points now because Senator Doody has told me that, when Senator Haidasz moves third reading, he plans to ask for an adjournment.

If you will pardon the pun, I think there may be something that we might want to smoke out, in terms of this sudden desire to have this bill not go forward, especially for the kinds of technical reasons that have been advanced to the Deputy Leader of the Government. I draw that to the attention of all senators so that they will see what is being proposed and keep their eyes on what I hope is the objective: namely, to pass this bill and pass it soon. I hope that it will be passed as early as next week. That, mind you, would be a reason for sitting tomorrow.

● (1440)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I do not want to leave anybody under any misapprehension in this regard; the only person who approached me regarding this particular bill was the Law Clerk of the Senate.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith should listen to this.

Senator Doody: I was not approached by any outside interests. I am not at all interested in delaying, stalling or defeating this bill. The more we do to discourage smoking, the happier I will be. I am not a smoker.

I simply want to reinforce what has been said by honourable senators opposite on many occasions—that is, that it is the Senate's job to try to get a piece of legislation as close to perfection as it can make it. If it is the wish of honourable senators opposite to pass this bill now in its somewhat imperfect form, there will no objection from me. Let it go and let posterity worry about it. It does not bother me at all. I have not been influenced by any skullduggery or back-room manipulation.

Senator Frith: No, and Senator Doody would not be. That is my point.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in accordance with the rules of this house, I now move third reading of Bill C-204.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: Where there's smoke there's fire!

Senator Flynn: I want to have an opportunity to look at the silly statements made by Senator Frith.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Frith: There is a little seepage there. It stung, did it?

Senator Perrault: You can smoke the peace-pipe with Senator Frith.

Senator Flynn: I am not ready to smoke the peace-pipe with Senator Frith yet.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources (Bill C-74, respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health, with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on June 14, 1988.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, I rise to move the adoption of the report on Bill C-74, respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health.

Your committee has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 1, 1988, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same with the following three amendments:

1. Page 5, clause 6: Strike out line 42 and substitute the following therefor:

"paragraph 34(1)(a), (b), (c), (d), (o) or"

This amendment corrects a typographical error introduced when the bill was reprinted and passed by the other place.

The second amendment is:

2. Page 40, clause 52: Strike out lines 21 and 22, and re-letter the subsequent subparagraph accordingly.

In testimony before the committee, representatives of the Grand Council of the Crees of Quebec and the Cree Regional Authority advised that lines 21 and 22 were introduced in the other place as one part of a two-part amendment which they had proposed. The first part of the proposed amendment added Category 1A lands as defined in the Cree-Naskapi (of Quebec) Act to the definition of federal lands. This change was accepted and appears as lines 21 and 22.

The second part of the proposed amendment would have required the federal government to seek the concurrence of the appropriate Cree band before regulations made under authority of Bill C-74 could be applied to their land. The government is not willing to accept the second part of the amendment, as confirmed by the Minister of the Environment when he appeared before the committee. Because he will not accept the second part of the amendment, the Cree representatives have requested that reference to Category 1A lands be deleted from the bill. Your committee asked the minister at the time of his appearance before the committee if he had any objection to deleting the above-mentioned lines, given that the government was not prepared to accept the other part of the amendment. He responded:

I am inclined to agree with the implication of your question that without the one, the other should be left out."

By deleting lines 21 and 22 the bill is returned to its original wording, before the amendment to the definition of "federal lands" was made.

The third and final amendment is:

3. Page 92, clause 149: In the French version, strike out line 10 and substitute the following therefor:

"fixées par proclamation."

This amendment is needed because the mechanism for bringing the bill into force in clause 149 is not the same in the two official languages. The government has decided that the mechanism should be by proclamation, since that was the procedure in use at the time the bill was drafted. Therefore, the French version needs to be amended to correspond with the English version.

Honourable senators, with these three amendments, the committee has completed its study of Bill C-74 and reports these changes for your consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that this report be now adopted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if there is no Royal Assent scheduled, is there a reason for doing this today?

Senator Robertson: Then I move that the bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill, as amended, placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL TRADE TRIBUNAL ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILLS C-110 AND C-121—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-110, An Act to establish the Canadian International Trade Tribunal and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof, and the subject-matter of the Bill C-121, An Act to authorize the reorganization and divestiture of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bills coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, it seems like a pleasant and warm afternoon to return to the subject of which we are all so fond, the matter of pre-study of bills. I do so today because Senator Frith was kind enough to respond almost immediately to my motion the other day.

Senator Frith: I can respond even more immediately to this one.

Senator MacDonald: However, I suspect that Senator Frith may have to wait, because Senator Hicks spoke to me yesterday, saying, "If you are going to speak again on pre-study, will you let me know in advance so that I can have another crack at it?"

Senator Frith: So you said, "Get in line!"

Senator MacDonald: I said, "You will have to stand in line."

Honourable senators, I think Senator Frith did a first-class job in dissecting my remarks in support of my arguments to prove the case in the first motion. In my naivety I thought that by acknowledging the demerits of the pre-study technique I would clear the decks for some form of compromise; but I can assure honourable senators I shall never make that mistake again. Let me begin by again reminding Senator Molgat, Senator Leblanc, Senator Lewis and Senator Langlois of that which they recommended in 1984, as members of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform.

Senator Perrault: You are not living in the past now; you are living in the present.

Senator MacDonald: This most useful arrangement, they say, gives the Senate legislative input without formally amending the bill and without risking confrontation.

Senator Steuart: We changed our minds.

Senator MacDonald: This procedure, they went on to say, was developed during the last 16 years in order to overcome some obstacles that prevented the Senate from accomplishing its legislative review role.

Senator Frith certainly grasped my acknowledgment that it is a basic principle of British parliamentary procedure that bills be dealt with consecutively by both houses. He not only grasped it, he chewed it to death—

Senator Frith: Apparently not, because you are still at it. It is not dead yet.

Senator MacDonald: But what I tried to point out was that this theory, this tradition, was developed in the historical context of a relatively balanced bicameralism.

In 19th century Britain most cabinet ministers sat in the House of Lords and therefore a substantial proportion of non-financial legislation could be introduced there. In our times the Senate of Canada—like the British House of Lords—has been reduced to a reactive role. Bills are most often introduced in the House of Commons and therefore the Upper House has had to deal with a proposal that has secured the support of the elected representatives of the people. The House expects quick approval of these bills—something which I realize is not of tremendous relevance to members of this chamber—but they are often sent to the Senate in the final days of a session. This is where I am going to make my main point today. The Senate is expected to adopt them quickly and without change. I make no comment on that. I make that as a statement of fact. In any event, adequate consideration of bills is often made difficult—if not impossible—by their late arrival from the Commons, and they appear before the Upper House in the dying days of a session. You will remember the remarks of Arthur Meighen: “It is little less than a travesty”, he said, “that this chamber, prepared for work, ready to serve the people of this country, should be compelled to wait more or less idly for weeks, perhaps months, while discussions, which are no doubt necessary under any democratic system . . .” take place.

It is also trite to say that members of the House of Commons tend to react negatively—trite to say—when the Senate amends legislative measures that are sometimes the product of inter-party bargaining in the House. At this late stage it is likely that the positions have so much hardened that little room is left for compromise. I suspect that that is not only the case between this house and the other place; I suspect at times there is not enough scotch whiskey in the world to make it easy to cut a deal or to accommodate the position of one another.

Senator Frith: Has it ever been tried?

Senator Doody: I have got a wonderful thirst.

Senator Frith: It is worth a spirited attempt.

Senator MacDonald: Pre-study was born in this context. This device allows the Senate to undertake the detailed study of a bill while the House of Commons is still discussing the merits thereof. This can be done by referring to a Senate committee not the bill itself, as we know—for the bill has been introduced in the other place and, being studied there, has not been officially transmitted to the Senate—but, rather, the “subject-matter” of the bill. That is what is examined.

Under this guise, the Senate committee short-cuts the decision of the House of Commons and comes up with a list of detailed amendments to the bill, if necessary. The list is included in the report of the committee that is tabled in the Senate by the chairman of the committee. Officially, this document is never transmitted to the House or to the committee of the House to which the bill has been referred. If members choose not to read the Senate Hansard, they will ignore the report. In practice, it is expected that the members of the relevant committee of the House will read the report and will adopt as theirs some of the suggestions of the senators. Should that be the case, there will be no necessity for the Senate to suggest amendments through the formal channels or even, arguably, to study the bill anew in a Senate committee.

• (1500)

I conclude by making reference to the very useful book written by Robert McKay, entitled “The Unreformed Senate”, which was revised in 1963. As an aside, I remember a pre-study “epidemic”, as it was referred to by one member, in 1971, although its genesis was really some time during the Second World War. At any rate, this is an extract from the revised form of the book, in which it is stated:

The practice—

that is, pre-study

—is, of course, quite informal and is not regularly followed—

This was in 1963.

—but on occasion has proved useful.

In light of the recommendations of the joint committee, taken along with the fact that this particular practice has proven to be widespread and useful, I suppose that the question I put to whomever wishes to respond—and I assume it is Senator Hicks—is this: Does he, in speaking for himself or for other members opposite, ever see the possibility that we could, as the session comes to an end, see the benefit of referring the subject matter of a bill for pre-study to an appropriate committee? Or is the Laird of Lake Ainslie—

Senator Roblin: Who is he?

Senator MacDonald: —to have such a disciplinary effect upon his colleagues that no possibility for compromise exists to ease the passage of legislation?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, Senator MacDonald has gone a little too far in anticipating the view that I was going to take of the motion to which he has just finished speaking. I am not categorically opposed to the pre-study of legislation. By no means. But before I come to my conclusion I should like to make a not too extended reference to the past history of this practice.

I know that it was not initiated in relation to this chamber by Senator Hayden, but when I first came here in 1972 it was Senator Hayden, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, who most often made use of the device of pre-study of legislation or the subject matter of legislation before it formally came before the Senate. He had the further practice of conferring with the minister in the other place responsible for the legislation, oftentimes securing the agreement of that minister that certain amendments ought to be made. The minister would then take those back while the bill was still in committee in the other place. Sometimes—perhaps I could even say often—those amendments were accepted and made by the House of Commons.

That practice undoubtedly improved legislation and probably sped up the legislative process. I suppose the thing that some of us did not like about it was that the improvements in the legislation—and normally they would be counted as such—were not made by the Senate, which had really done the work, discovered the errors and determined upon the method to remedy them, but were done in the House of Commons. The Senate, of course, was not acknowledged as having played any effective role in this improvement of legislation. However, that in itself, in my view, was not enough to have stopped the pre-study of legislation. It is quite true that we in the Senate could have dealt with the matter in a different way. After our committee had done its pre-study, we could have insisted that the report of the committee come back and that the amendments be made here in the Senate rather than through some agreement with the minister concerned. But that is a trifling matter.

Where, in my view, did the situation get off the rails? First, I insist that the parliamentary routine normally regarded as the usual process for dealing with legislation—and which has been referred to in extenso by Senator Frith in his remarks of yesterday and at other times—should be followed; that that is the process by which legislation becomes law; that one house deals with it and passes it on to the other house, which then deals with it. That second house, upon receiving the bill, ought not to be curtailed or trammelled in any way in the handling of the legislation according to its normal procedure. Therefore, in my view, if we consent to the pre-study of any legislation—and even if one of our committees works on it for a week or a month, or three months in the extreme, that should still have no bearing on the ability of this house to refer the legislation, after it has received second reading, to that same committee, or any other committee, in accordance with the rules of this house.

Honourable senators, I suppose what triggered our annoyance or disaffection with the pre-study procedure was the very strong, almost vehement, assertion of the present Leader of the Government in the Senate on a previous occasion that because a committee of this house had pre-studied legislation there was no reason for it to be referred, after second reading, back to a committee. I want to make the point that I think that argument is not acceptable and I hope it will never be made again in this house. In any event, I would never consider myself bound by such a proposition.

The point I really want to make, Senator MacDonald, is the point I have already made, that I am not opposed to the pre-study of legislation. I am violently opposed to the proposition that because legislation has been pre-studied we have precluded our right, or even our duty, to refer the legislation to the same or to some other committee, in accordance with our rules, after it has received second reading. I agree with the observation that the late R.A. MacKay made in his book "The Unreformed Senate" in 1953, and I think there may well be occasions when the pre-study of legislation does save time and avoid that—what shall I say?—pile-up of legislation during the last few days prior to an agreed-upon adjournment of the House.

Honourable senators, I have made my point. I do not categorically oppose the pre-study of legislation. I do think that the arguments advanced yesterday in relation to Air

Canada and the arguments which might apply to the free trade legislation in respect of pre-study are arguments which stand on their own. I would not support going into a pre-study, for example, of the free trade legislation at this time, when it is already receiving as much attention as the Committee on Foreign Affairs can give to it, albeit in another form or in another context. I repeat, then, that I am not categorically opposed to the pre-study of legislation, but I do want to make strongly the point that pre-study does in no way preclude subsequent reference of the legislation, after second reading, to a committee—either the same or any other committee—in accordance with the rules of this house.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1988-89

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-third report (Interim) of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates, 1988-89), presented in the Senate on June 7, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I should like to give some explanations regarding the interim report of the Committee on National Finance on the Main Estimates, 1988-89.

Whenever the committee proceeds with consideration of the Main Estimates, it follows the standard procedure that has been in place for ten or fifteen years. It first hears the President of the Treasury Board and subsequently holds a series of meetings covering a particular theme. This year the committee chose to examine the spending estimates of the three research granting councils, particularly in the context of the matching grants program announced by the federal government in 1986. The committee's report on this question will be tabled very shortly. The report I shall be discussing today deals only with the Estimates in general.

The President of the Treasury Board indicated to the committee that the government expected to spend a total of $132.3 billion. Of this, the government has identified $119.4 billion in the Estimates, representing a 7.7 per cent increase over the previous fiscal year. The remaining $12.9 billion is reserved for supplementary expenditures and other provisions.

Some committee members said they were concerned about the difficulty experienced by the government in reducing the annual deficit, when so much of the annual estimates were taken up with statutory expenditures. Mr. Mazankowski stated that many of these items were destined for programs such as social assistance, income security and the fiscal transfers to the provinces. He added that while there had been extensive review of these statutory expenditures in recent years, it was very difficult to consider changes to them because, as he acknowledged himself, "they have become a way of life and are part of the Canadian tradition of sharing".

The committee is aware of the problem but maintains, considering current revenues and expenditures, that it may be difficult to reduce the annual deficit from its current level of $28.9 billion to the projected $19.5 billion by 1992-93.

Committee members took this opportunity to remind the government of its past observations about the incompatibility of the legislative requirement of annual appropriations with programs with uncertain timing of expenditures. The committee commented on this problem in its thirteenth report, when it reviewed the overexpenditure by the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion in Supplementary Estimates (B), 1987-88. The committee raises this point in its current report to remind the government of this important fact and to indicate that it will watch for and report on instances where legislative compliance and annual appropriations may not necessarily provide satisfactory results.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FIFTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages (Calgary Olympic Winter Games), presented in the Senate on 17th December, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Guay, P.C.).

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I should like to withdraw this report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Report withdrawn.

TRADE PROPAGANDA

NATURE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 7, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the nature of trade propaganda.

He said: Honourable senators, the other day in Question Period we were discussing the amount of money that had been spent to sell the Free Trade Agreement. The Leader of the Government in the Senate said that this was not another one of those Liberal exercises with all those Canada geese. He was perfectly right—we could not use the Canada geese, because they have been plucked and they would not be photogenic.

Senator Perrault: They can not fly any more.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, at this time I am not addressing myself to the substance of the Free Trade Agreement but to the tactics in that huge propaganda campaign. That campaign is allegedly a campaign to inform the public of Canada, but it only gives one point of view.

The Research Branch of the Library of Parliament has produced a document that gives both sides—pro and con—on every issue. They quote people by name and say where they can be found. However, the government documents that are being used in this campaign are not evenhanded. They are documents that contain propaganda. Good propaganda consists of the truth, nothing but the truth, but never the whole truth.

I received a document in a brown envelope. On the cover page it says: "For Official Use Only, No. 010288", and is entitled "Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement—Questions and Answers Based on the Legal Text, revised February 1988." This is an excellent example of propaganda. It gives only one side of the issue. It slips over various other aspects which are equally legitimate and which the people of Canada are entitled to know. For instance, on page 9 it states:

● (1520)

Why is the deal on fisheries important for Canadian fisheries? The agreement is a substantial improvement in terms of market access available to Canadian fish exporters. It limits the ability of the U.S. to impose import controls on Canadian fish, and the dispute-settlement process will reduce the harassment of the industry.

Senator Cogger: That is fact, that is not propaganda!

Senator Gigantès: It is the truth, nothing but the truth, but not the whole truth. The whole truth is that, after the binational dispute-settlement mechanism, any American entrepreneur who does not like the dispute-settlement mechanism answer can go to court. It is stated in the U.S. Constitution; it is a right that cannot be withdrawn. The harassment will continue.

On "Automotive Rules of Origin", page 11, it states:

Changes in the general provisions of the agreement regarding rules of origin will result in a tightening of the elements which can be counted towards domestic content, resulting in a greater incentive for the sourcing of North American parts.

The truth, nothing but the truth, but not the whole truth. The whole truth is that we wanted 60 per cent.

Senator Cogger: The whole truth is only found in the Bible.

Senator Gigantès: The whole truth is that we wanted 60 per cent North American content; the U.S. Big 3 wanted 50 per cent, because with 50 per cent they can manufacture a car here, the engine and the electronic parts of which—all the technology and heavy parts—are made offshore. What they make here are the body, the upholstery, the glass and the tires. We have become technological appendages of Japan and the mini-Japans. It is not said in the government propaganda document I am quoting that we did not want the 50 per cent. We wanted 60 per cent, but did not get it.

Senator Cogger: The truth and nothing but the truth!

Senator Gigantès: There is another passage on page 20, which states:

Canada has obtained duty-free and more secure access to the United States market for agricultural and food products such as potatoes.

We have obtained access, but what does the access mean when the manager of the Winnipeg McCain plant states that he can get potatoes from Washington State for $92 a tonne and Canadian potatoes for $120 a tonne? How will we sell $120-a-tonne potatoes to the Americans, when they can grow them for $92 a tonne and deliver them?

Senator Cogger: What was that?

Senator Gigantès: The book says that you will have more access for potatoes. I say that, since American potatoes are cheaper to grow and deliver, you will not have more access in the U.S. for Canadian potatoes; you will have more access in Canada for U.S. potatoes.

There was an interesting article in Maclean's—and I do not have the date, but I can find it for you—in which Mr. McCain, of McCain Foods, is giving an interview to Peter Newman. He states:

—in the case of this particular deal, I'd have to say, "Don't dupe us in the food industry." . . . At the moment, the Americans are not allowed to ship their cheese into Canada, but with free trade, they'll be selling their pizzas here duty-free. How do we buy cheese in Canada at 39 per cent more and still be competitive? We can't be. And we have exactly the same problem with our frozen dinners because of chicken marketing boards, and so on.

What would be the company's future inside a free trade area?

asks Mr. Peter Newman. He goes on to say:

Harrison McCain didn't want to be that specific, but he recently sent a private letter to New Brunswick Premier Frank McKenna in which he pointedly explained that, if economic factors were to make his plant's continued presence in the province untenable, "we're a multinational and have other options—unfortunately our employees and growers don't."

That completes the picture and gives the full truth; the propaganda document I have in my hands does not.

There are other instances, but I will not give you the whole of it, because propaganda gets to be tiresome.

Our government provided health care and hospital facilities covered under the services chapter of the Free Trade Agreement. It states here that the only aspect of health care potentially included is "management services, such as specialized computer software applications, which could be commercially provided . . ." and so on.

What about private health insurance? What about U.S. insurance companies or U.S. practitioners coming to Canada to establish here branches of their U.S. hospitals, such as the Humana Chain, which pays its chief executive officer $17 million a year in salary?—it is a very profitable business. They will come here and want to finance this through private insurance. Of course, it will be expensive and will be for the rich who can afford to pay this private insurance, but where will the best doctors go? They will go where they will be paid an awful lot. Where will the best nurses go?

We happen to have a medical saint in this chamber. This is a remarkable physician. Unfortunately, they are not all like him. All the physicians in this chamber are remarkable physicians; all the lawyers are remarkable; and all the other senators are remarkable, and honest and angelic—I love you all. The one good thing I know about a non-elected Senate is that I will not risk losing such good people on either side of the house in an election. I am glad you are here.

There is absolutely nothing in this agreement to stop a U.S. hospital service from coming here. Mr. Peterson has passed laws to try to stop it, because it cannot be stopped in the agreement. That is not mentioned to the public.

Is there support for this sort of thing in Canada? Of course there is. The Quebec chamber of commerce has just passed a resolution suggesting that Medicare should be privatized, or that, if Medicare is not privatized, a special service through private insurance should be allowed for the rich. Mrs. Thatcher has followed that course and has gutted the British health service.

Let us pass to financial institutions. First, in this Free Trade Agreement we allow five separate Americans to buy 10 per cent each of a Canadian bank, and they say that ". . . we need American investment dollars because they will also be an important source of funds in order to increase the size and specialization of various Canadian firms," and so on.

Felix Rohatyn is the senior partner of Lazard Freres, a major merchant bank. He is an astute man who was called upon to save New York from bankruptcy. He states:

More than two hundred years after the Declaration of Independence, the United States has lost its position as an independent power.

This was written in the New York Review of Books in February of 1988.

I continue the quotation. It is because of the—. . . rapid rise in the level of U.S. assets owned abroad . . . Those assets . . . may consist of . . . controlling interests in many of our major companies and financial institutions . . . Should we allow SONY to acquire control of Time Inc.?—

But they want to be able to buy our newspapers—

. . . Would we allow . . . foreign control of the Morgan Bank?—

This is Mr. Rohatyn expressing shock at the idea that a foreign power might own a U.S. financial institution:

. . . We must be able to carry on our business whether or not it is in Japan's interest . . . or . . . in Europe's interest . . . No other major industrial power . . . certainly not Japan, and not even Great Britain allows major companies of strategic importance to be acquired by foreign interests... A highly selective review mechanism may become necessary—

He is asking for FIRA for the United States!

... this would not cause the flight of foreign capital any more than such procedures have caused capital flight from the U.K., Germany or Japan.

That is another part of the truth. The acquisition of key industries and key financial institutions in Canada worries some people. In fact, a similar danger worries Americans. However, a propaganda document does not tell you all the truth; it only tells you part of the truth—it does not tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth!

Again, let us come back to the geese. I understand our goose has been plucked, and we cannot really use it any more in television commercials; it would look rather ugly.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGY

NEED FOR ROYAL COMMISSION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, inquiry No. 5 stands in the name of Senator Spivak. When that inquiry was called, I inadvertently asked for it to stand. It is Senator Spivak's desire to address this inquiry this afternoon, if the Senate will permit. Honourable senators, I ask for your indulgence.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mira Spivak rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, June 1, 1988:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the need for a Royal Commission on Reproductive Technology.

She said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on this issue in this chamber in support of the call for a royal commission by a group of concerned Canadian citizens, the Canadian Coalition for a Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies, and to outline some of the reasons behind such a call.

Senator Gigantès: Too late for some of us!

Senator Spivak: A profound change in the way we think about conception, motherhood, fatherhood, parenthood, and, indeed, the nature and value of human life itself is under way as a result of the development of new reproductive technologies. These have moved forward with astonishing speed since a decade ago, when the world was stunned by the first test-tube baby.

Moreover, reproductive and genetic engineering could radically alter human life as it is known today. What we are seeing is nothing less than a revolution in reproduction. For example, reproduction can now include at least three parties rather than the normal two.

[Senator Gigantès.]

These developments, which involve fundamental, moral and ethical decisions, as well as major resource decisions, are occurring without benefit of public debate, without understanding of their broad social implications and without benefit of a philosophic framework to guide decision-making.

The technologies of which I speak include: artificial insemination; in vitro and in vivo fertilization; frozen embryo storage and transplants; fetal tissue transplants; cloning; prenatal screening techniques and sex selection and preselection. In vitro fertilization—the technique that produces what has been known as “test-tube babies”—involves increasing egg production through large doses of hormones, removing them, fertilizing them in a lab dish with the spouse's sperm, and then re-implanting the fertilized eggs several days later. Usually four or five fertilized eggs are re-implanted to increase the chance of a successful pregnancy. At some clinics the remaining embryos are frozen in liquid nitrogen for use at a later date.

In vitro fertilization has produced multiple births, babies from donated eggs, babies from frozen embryos, babies from frozen eggs and babies whose sex was preselected. In vivo fertilization involves the removal of a fertilized egg from a woman and its re-implantation or its implantation in another woman. In embryo transfer an ovum is conceived in one woman and then transferred to the womb of another woman, or a donor ovum is conceived in vitro and then implanted in another woman.

There is rapid, unchallenged and largely unregulated growth in the research and marketing of these technologies in Canada. The first sex selection clinic in Canada, run on a private franchise basis, opened in Toronto in the fall of 1987. People can now choose the sex of an embryo before fertilization and they can identify the sex of an existing embryo. Canada now has 12 IVF clinics. The work being done in these clinics is highly experimental; the success rate is around 10 per cent. The Government of Ontario—the only one in the world to finance IVF clinics—has spent more than $7 million in two years on four clinics. During that time more than 200 babies have been born, at a cost of $35,000 per baby. Factors spurring these developments include the growing incidence of infertility in our society and, as usually justified by those involved in fetal research, the desire to offer improved life prospects to defective fetuses and to maintain existing medical standards of prenatal and postnatal care of mother and child.

With respect to the problem of infertility, the attention of the medical and scientific community is focused on dramatic treatment, and not as much thought is being given to the prevention of infertility. For example, to what extent is infertility a product of other interventions in the reproductive process, such as the pill and the intrauterine device? The new technologies themselves create complications which then give rise to further dramatic measures. A case in point is pregnancy reduction, in which, through recent advances in ultrasound technology, a woman carrying multiple fetuses can have one or more of those fetuses eliminated while letting the rest survive. This procedure is being carried out for women who, through in vitro fertilization or fertility drugs, become pregnant with more fetuses than can be safely carried to term.

In those countries that regulate fetal experimentation it is generally subject to strict conditions of purpose and time. For example, a 1982 provision of the British Medical Research Council restricted this research to that which is clearly defined and directly related to clinical problems and which is conducted within six weeks of conception—the time period during which the council posits that the fetus can feel no pain. The United States Ethics Advisory Board has limited such research to 14 days from conception and to purposes designed primarily to establish the safety and efficiency of embryo transfer. Only a few weeks ago the Medical Research Council of Canada issued guidelines on genetic and embryo research. However, the council has no authority over scientists who are not receiving federal grants for their research.

Many as yet unaddressed questions are raised by the new reproductive technologies. With respect to the treatment of infertility, are such painful, uncertain and costly measures as in vitro fertilization and embryo transfer preferable to adoption and to the more successful and less expensive, less dangerous and less invasive procedure of artificial insemination by donor? Do people in our society have an inalienable right to be parents? If so, which people have this right: Those who can afford treatment? Unmarried women? Who should bear the costs of reproductive processes? How important is it for children to be genetically related to parents? Is a genetic link to the father important enough to justify the practice of buying reproductive services from surrogate mothers? Can the human body, or any of its parts, be treated as the subject matter of a contract? What are the legal consequences of “donating” human ova or sperm? What is the legal effect of consent agreements that are executed in the course of these transactions? If the recipient of donor gametes is married, what is the legal status of that spouse? What constitutes the family? A child conceived through a variety of artificial reproductive technologies can have as many as five different “parents”: the sperm donor, the egg donor, the gestational mother and the parents who rear the child.

Prenatal diagnosis now allows us to identify the sex of the fetus, to diagnose in utero all recognizable chromosome disorders, over 100 biochemical disorders, and many selected developmental malformations, and to manage pregnancy based on this information.

What are the overt and covert purposes of such diagnoses? What are their implications? Who has access to these services? Are patients informed about the risks to themselves and to the fetus? What values, and whose personal, ethical and social values, guide decision-making in this context?

Although we have, as individual members of our society, considered reproductive processes to be largely a private matter, there is growing medical, legal and social control of reproduction as a result of these scientific advances. Since procreation is ultimately a social function, it is inevitable that society will establish qualitative and quantitative forms of control over it. Unfortunately, the speed with which these advances are being adopted into clinical practice has allowed little time to consider many of the important moral, legal and ethical issues that have arisen in human reproduction. We have not determined the purposes of these services, whom these services are really for, who benefits from them, the values underlying the allocation of these services and whether they constitute a just allocation of medical funds, personnel, resources and facilities.

The issues raised by the new techniques are of great consequence to our society and are deserving of immediate attention, not only by the providers of these services but by all who have an interest in the kind of society we want today and in the future. To attempt to resolve these issues through ad hoc legislation, though it may be useful in dealing with uncertainties and gaps in our existing legal framework, is to risk creating new social problems. To attempt to resolve these issues through hasty, comprehensive legislation is to risk insidiously sheltering other controversial reproductive technologies and prematurely crystallizing the implications of modern medicine before basic notions of morality, law and life have been the subject of at least relative consensus. To attempt to resolve these issues on a case-by-case basis is to prevent the formation of fundamental philosophy or theory with which to guide decision-making in the future.

Canada as a nation needs to confront these issues and develop a national response to them. We stand in particular need of a policy-oriented approach that would subject the legal, moral and ethical issues raised by the new techniques to public scrutiny and provide a forum for broadly-based discussion of the larger social implications of these developments. At the earliest possible time we need some instrument, like a royal commission on new reproductive technologies, that, in addition to encouraging public debate of these issues, would seek the expert opinions of our philosophers, social scientists, political scientists, theologians, legal historians, medical researchers, historians, lawyers, physicians and others, who could further our insight into and understanding of the implications of these developments. The goals of this undertaking would be the development of a fundamental philosophy or theory to guide decision-making and the development of national guidelines for the regulation of the new reproductive technologies and for the provision of reproductive services.

In this call for a royal commission, I support a coalition of 20 organizations from nine provinces, the Canadian Coalition for a Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. Individuals represented by this coalition include outstanding professionals in a variety of related fields. The Minister of Health, the Honourable Jake Epp, has recognized the need for such a forum for the examination of these issues. However, he has deferred requesting cabinet approval while abortion remains an outstanding issue.

Due to the urgency of this matter, a royal commission on new reproductive technologies should be established to investigate the social implications of reproductive techniques and reach for some form of social consensus before we commit ourselves, either tacitly or expressly, to any or all of the ensuing consequences. This investigation could include, but not be restricted to, an examination of the implications of the techniques and arrangements I have spoken of—in vitro fertilization and all the others.

The commission could further include an examination of social and legal arrangements concerning the production of children, such as pre-conception contracts, judicial interventions during pregnancy and birth and the commercial marketing of semen, eggs and embryos, as well as the use of people for reproductive services and related issues. It could investigate these issues in terms of their separate and joint implications for women, men, the resulting children, other relatives, professionals and other personnel involved.

Because many of the implications of these techniques are not widely known, though they affect the very fabric of human social life, such a commission in communicating its findings in the broadest possible manner would be rendering a public service.

New reproductive techniques bring the happiness of parenthood to many couples otherwise unable to have children, but they also pose ethical and moral dilemmas—issues of profound complexity. As Canadians, we must decide how we will balance fundamental values and interests to shape the future we desire for our children. We must determine how advances in medicine and science will be used to support those values and institutions we hold precious. So we must come to grips with these new realities that have been thrust upon us. I urge senators to give some thought to these issues and some consideration to the need for such a royal commission.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION TO TRANSMIT COPY OF SENATE RESOLUTION TO LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES AND FOUR NATIONAL ABORIGINAL ORGANIZATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Charlie Watt, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 31, 1988, moved:

That the Honourable the Speaker do transmit to the Legislative Assembly of each province a copy of the Resolution to amend the Constitution of Canada, adopted by the Senate on 21st April, 1988, and urge that the provinces do likewise; and

[Senator Spivak.]

That a copy of the said Resolution be transmitted by the Honourable the Speaker to the Legislative Assemblies of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories and to the four National Organizations representing the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, in the second paragraph of the motion the words "Legislative Assemblies" should be replaced by "Territorial Councils".

• (1550)

Honourable senators, I would like to make a number of important points about the motion I have just presented.

First, I would like to speak about the role of the Senate in the constitution amending process. A few weeks ago we adopted a motion to send a message to the House of Commons informing them of the constitution amendment we approved on April 21, 1988. We may have done that because of our relationship with the lower house within Parliament in legislative matters. Beyond that, sending that message was a valuable step in that the House of Commons has an essential role to play in the approval of any constitution amendment.

However, I wish to stress that the role of the Senate in the constitution amending process is not the same as that of the Senate in the legislative process. In fact, we are only one of 12 legislative bodies involved in authorizing the proclamation of an amendment to the Constitution. In this general sense, we are no more linked to the House of Commons than to the legislative assemblies of the provinces.

It is for this reason that I move this motion today. If we are to stand behind the Senate resolution of April 21, 1988, we must be prepared to communicate directly with the provincial assemblies and to seek their support for our approach to amending the Canadian Constitution. To do any less would be to ignore the simple realities of the constitution amending process we have been operating under since 1982.

Some honourable senators may question the need for the unusual step of communicating directly with the legislative assemblies of the provinces. Once again, the answer can be found in the Constitution. Part V of the Constitution is silent on the manner in which the Senate, the House of Commons and the provincial assemblies are to be kept informed of the status of a constitution amendment that is working its way through the amending process. It states only that the Privy Council shall advise the Governor General when the conditions for the proclamation of a constitution amendment have been met. Obviously, correspondence among the premiers and the Prime Minister may do much to help keep the various parties informed about the status of a constitution amendment; however, it is easy to see that in some circumstances this process may not be entirely adequate. I say that it is time we instituted the practice of communicating directly with the legislative assembly of each province about our actions and decisions within the constitution amending process.

Some honourable senators may be wondering why we would be communicating with the territorial councils of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. After the work of the Senate task force and the special emphasis we placed on northern concerns with the Meech Lake Accord, I think it only natural that we keep the people of the territories informed of the results of our deliberations by communicating with them through their territorial councils.

Likewise, some may wonder why the Senate would wish to communicate directly with the aboriginal peoples. It might be because their rights would be affected by our resolution. But the most compelling reason is that, through their involvement in First Ministers' Conferences, the aboriginal peoples have been recognized as direct and legitimate participants in Canada's constitution reform process. Although groups representing labour, business and municipalities have sought this privilege, only the aboriginal peoples have had the right to sit with governments to discuss constitutional matters. This is already implicit recognition of their right to self-government within Canada. Whatever the case, the precedent has been established. Consequently, the Senate should keep them informed of its actions within the constitution amending process, especially when their rights may be directly affected.

The second point I wish to develop concerns the uncomfortable dilemma in which Canada finds itself vis-à-vis the Meech Lake constitution reform process.

When the Senate approved a resolution authorizing a modified version of the Meech Lake Accord, we did something far more important than simply rejecting the resolution put before us by the government. In fact, we initiated the procedure for an entirely new set of constitution amendments. In other words, there are now, formally, two sets of constitution amendments before the country: first, those contained in the Meech Lake Accord, which emerged from a meeting of First Ministers on June 3, 1987; and, second, those contained in the resolution approved by the Senate on April 21 of this year.

With the developments surrounding the New Brunswick election and, more recently, the Manitoba election, the original version of the Meech Lake Accord may have reached the end of the road as a viable constitution amendment. While this may free us from the dangers arising from the flaws in the accord, it also poses a serious dilemma for the country. Many people, including myself, do not think that the current opportunity to bring Quebec back into the constitutional fold should be discarded so quickly.

I believe that Senate action initiating the procedure for a second set of constitution amendments could be used to overcome the dilemma in which Canada currently finds itself. I say this because we took care to ensure that our resolution did not nullify any of the principles of the Meech Lake Accord that would allow Quebec to end its political isolation from the Constitution and the constitution reform process. In other words, our so-called "killer" amendments could actually be used to rescue the Meech Lake process.

In order to accomplish this, the Senate must be ready to bring its resolution and the constitution amending process, which we initiated, to the attention of the country. The first step in this undertaking is to bring our resolution to the attention of the provincial assemblies, the territorial councils and the aboriginal peoples by communicating directly with them.

For all these reasons I invite honourable senators to consider immediate adoption of this motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONTINUE STUDY OF CONSULTATION PAPER ON CHILD AND ELDERLY BENEFITS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 9, 1988:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the study undertaken in 1985-86-87 on the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, tabled in the Senate on February 5, 1985; and

That the date for presenting its final report, which previously was December 22, 1987, now be extended to no later than March 31, 1989.

He said: Honourable senators, at this late hour dare I move the motion of which I gave notice last week? Since it is such a simple and uncomplicated motion, this will not take long.

Honourable senators, a few short words of explanation about the meaning of this motion. It deals with the same issue indeed, namely the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits which was twice referred to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology during the first session of this 33rd Parliament and which is now back before us.

The committee did examine part of the mandate. It considered the part concerning child benefits and tabled two reports on that subject, an interim report and a final report which was considered by the Senate a few weeks ago.

We are now seeking authority to continue our proceedings and to discharge our full mandate, which means the part concerning the elderly. In this respect, the intent of the motion is quite simply to change the date of presentation of the final report of the committee, as was done before.

That is the meaning of the motion. The continuity I have just noted with respect to the reference of the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits being extant, it seems to me that a simple date change should not cause any problem. That is what I am proposing, honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology?

Do the committee members unanimously support this motion?

Senator Tremblay: As a matter of fact the matter was discussed in committee and we agreed on this. As far as I know nobody raised any objection; there was no opposition, or so it seems to me.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): This is your last chance to change your mind! You still have a chance. We will revert, if you like.

Senator Doody: Senator Frith wants to revert, but I like him the way he is! I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

VISITOR IN GALLERY

DR. GERRY WARD, LETHBRIDGE, ALBERTA

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is with a great deal of pride that I introduce a special guest who is sitting in our gallery, Dr. Gerry Ward. He is from Lethbridge, Alberta, and is currently travelling across Canada in support of the Canadian Hunger Foundation, which aids self-help food production interests in the Third World.

Dr. Ward, a former minister, is cycling across Canada. He has covered more than 6,000 kilometres in the last five weeks, all the way from Victoria, and will end up in Saint John, New Brunswick, within the next couple of weeks.

In addition to supporting the food production of the Third World, by going through the tail winds of the Rockies and the dust storms of the Prairies, Dr. Ward, at 74 years of age, is also showing us that we can all be ageless if we have the will to participate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I wish to endorse what Senator Fairbairn just said about our visitor. I do so because I am on the national board of this eminently humanitarian enterprise led by Dr. Ward. Speaking for myself, I welcome him most warmly.

HIS EXCELLENCY DR. HELMUT KOHL CHANCELLOR OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that the address of the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons today, together with all introductory and related speeches, be printed as an appendix to Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INDIAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 16, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-115, An Act to amend the Indian Act (designated lands), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, June 9, 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendment:

Page 6, clause 10: Strike out line 31 and substitute the following therefor:

“regulations not inconsistent with this section”

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Neiman: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, as you have just heard, Bill C-115 was considered by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee yesterday and the committee found nothing of substance that required change. There was just the one small typographical error with which we are dealing today. This change has been concurred in, in advance.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that Bill C-115 be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I want to say just a few words about this legislation. I do not think it would have been possible for this bill to have progressed the way it did had it not been for the good work of Chief Manny Jules of Kamloops. Chief Jules has done a lot of work on it. He appeared before us in committee yesterday to explain the bill, and I think all senators who heard him were impressed with the marvelous work that he has obviously done.

Chief Jules is a young, dynamic leader of the Kamloops Indian Band, and he is typical of the generation of young leaders in the Indian community who are around today. As self-government develops I hope we will see more of this kind of activity before legislation, especially as it relates to Indians, is brought before Parliament. It is often difficult to get agreement in the Indian community on a piece of legislation. In this case, however, I think it is because of the outstanding work of Chief Manny Jules that it was possible to bring things together and agree upon them in such a manner.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 21, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

● (1410)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Deputy Leader of the Government indicate whether he expects to have any additional government business on the order paper for Tuesday next?

Senator Doody: At this point I cannot say that there will be additional government business on the order paper; I can only repeat what I said yesterday. Quite a number of bills are in committee. When we meet on Tuesday, if the sitting is short and there are not too many items, other than government items, on the order paper, perhaps we could adjourn, and then various committees could take advantage of the opportunity to meet.

It might also be possible for us not to sit on Wednesday, in which case we could also allocate that day for meetings. I had hoped that Wednesday evening would be available for committee meetings, but I understand that that possibility has been pre-empted by another event. Depending on what transpires on Wednesday, it might be possible to allocate Thursday for the same purpose. At some time next week the Committee of the Whole has to meet on Bill C-77, the Emergencies Bill. If convenient, that could be done on Tuesday afternoon; if not, we might be able to do it on Thursday.

The items we have to consider are the bills I listed yesterday, which are before various committees and which I will not repeat today. Perhaps committee chairmen and the whips could consult to determine what hours could be allocated for committees on Tuesday afternoon, Wednesday afternoon, and perhaps Thursday.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I accept what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said with respect to next week. In the future we, on this side, will be seriously tempted to amend the adjournment motion, to have the Senate sit only when there is government business.

Senator Doody: I appreciate what Senator MacEachen is saying, and I actively subscribe to the theory that there is no need for the entire Senate to sit when there is only committee business to be dealt with. Yesterday I implored Senate committee members to attend their committee meetings when the Senate was not sitting. If that could happen, and if we could be assured of a commitment from all committee members to come to Ottawa for committee meetings, and not say, "Because the Senate is not sitting I am not going to go to Ottawa simply for a committee meeting," then there would be no problem. We have tried this on many occasions. As I said yesterday, sometimes it works. Unfortunately, many times there is not a quorum or there are not enough members from either side to make the committee function properly. Because of that we felt there was the necessity of going through the routine I described for next week. I agree that it would be preferable for the entire body not to have to come back to Ottawa simply for committee meetings.

Senator MacEachen: I agree that it should be possible to have committee meetings, even though the Senate itself is not sitting. It seems to me that that should be taken for granted.

The deputy leader has talked about the frequency with which committee meetings have to adjourn because of a lack of quorum when the Senate is not sitting. I ask my next question because I do not know the answer. Do we have a record of the frequency with which this has occurred, and a record of what committees have been particularly affected by this principle that unless the Senate sits committees do not meet? If we are to deal with this properly, it would be interesting to know what the experience has been and to see whether individual committees could undertake the necessary measures to ensure that a meeting takes place when required.

Senator Doody: I do not have that information with me. However, I agree that it could be quite useful. I suggest that our two whips look through the records and see exactly where we stand on these two matters

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it must be obvious to honourable senators that Senator Murray is not with us today. However, I would be glad to take as notice any questions that senators wish to ask.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

DEFERRAL OF QUESTIONS TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, since Senator Doody is taking questions as notice, I should like to ask him the question that I would have asked Senator Murray.

Am I to understand from his pattern of answering all questions that I have put on the Free Trade Agreement that he will not answer such questions here, and that he would like these questions asked in committee?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly see that Senator Murray gets that question.

Senator Gigantès: I am grateful to Senator Doody; he will probably elicit a more sympathetic response from Senator Murray than I would.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, moved the third reading of Bill C-74, as amended, respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 1:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill C-204, An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Order No. 1 stands in Senator Flynn's name, and he has adjourned the debate. May I assume that if he does not proceed on Tuesday next he will yield to someone else who may wish to speak to it?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I could deal with it today. However, I believe Senator Doody explained generally why we do not want to dispose of that order.

Senator Frith: Yes, I know, but that is why I wanted to speak to it.

Senator Flynn: I would yield to anyone who wants to speak to it. I may be late next week so I have no objection to anyone else's speaking to it.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill S-18, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976.

He said: Honourable senators, the objective of Bill S-18 is to effect an amendment to the preamble of the Immigration Act, 1976. The preamble in the present policy takes into account the federal and bilingual character of Canada as a factor in developing and administering Canadian immigration policy. My amendment would add the word "multicultural" to the preamble, which would then read as follows:

taking into account the federal, bilingual and multicultural character of Canada.

This change is in keeping with a number of important changes that have taken place in the recent past. Among them, and the most significant change, was recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage, enshrined in section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Bill C-93, a bill which is now being considered in the other place, will, if adopted, provide a legislative framework for the policy of multiculturalism. I shall have more to say about Bill C-93 when it is examined in this chamber.

● (1420)

In support of this amendment there is also a copy of a letter dated March 19, 1986, from the former Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the Honourable Walter McLean, addressed to Senator Barootes. The minister was replying to a letter from Senator Barootes, who had written to the minister concerning my request for the insertion of the word "multicultural" in the preamble to the policy during our debate on Bill C-55, the first refugee bill that came before this chamber.

The minister promised "to give this issue full consideration in the amending process that deals with the broader reform of the refugee determination system which we hope to introduce in late Spring."

Here, honourable senators, the minister was referring to the spring of 1986.

The new refugee determination bill was presented in August 1987, when Parliament was recalled prematurely to deal with an alleged emergency. There was no amendment to the preamble of the bill, as had been promised by the Honourable Walter McLean. I am not suggesting that that omission was deliberate. I am positive that it was an oversight. Nevertheless, it was a very serious oversight. It shows a lack of sensitivity on the part of this government towards the policy of multiculturalism. Also, a promise by a minister of the Crown to a very prominent and important member of this chamber, Senator Barootes, ought not to have been overlooked. I am sure that Senator Barootes is embarrassed by this omission, and he might wish to say a few words in the debate that will ensue.

Honourable senators, I do not foresee any objection to this amendment, as both the New Democrats and Conservatives, when they were in opposition, supported an identical amendment, reference to which can be found in House of Commons Debates of July 21, 1977, at page 7883.

The policy of multiculturalism represents a leap forward in the evolution of Canadian society.

Sociologist Jean Burnet, who served on the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, had this to say, as reported in a column written by Joe Serge in the Toronto Star on June 13, 1988—

Senator Frith: I am sorry, who is it you are quoting?

Senator Bosa: Jean Burnet.

Senator Frith: I understand that she was an adviser.

Senator Haidasz: She is a professor of sociology, I understand.

Senator Frith: I thought you meant that she was a member of that commission. I know that there was a Burnet who wrote textbooks.

Senator Doody: Perhaps we should adjourn while you have your conversation.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I welcome the intervention. Professor Burnet was a research associate with the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. In any event, Professor Burnet said:

People from all over the world are becoming Canadians without having to deny or denigrate their origins. Attitudes have changed a lot in the past 50 years . . . What I'd like to see is that people who wish to retain some of their background would be viewed equal to those who choose to discard it.

Honourable senators, Canadian society is made up of scores of minorities, and millions of Canadians find comfort in the policy of multiculturalism. The promotion of understanding and mutual acceptance of our differences has made Canada a strong and united country. I believe that because of this policy Canada is spared the racial and violent strife that afflicts a number of other societies.

Canada is a peaceful kingdom. The origin of this state of affairs can be found in Canada's history. Two great people, the British and the French, have shared a common destiny in the new world; for over 200 years they have lived and worked side by side for a better future. The Liberals have given a name to that duality. They have defined it as "unity in diversity".

[Senator Bosa]

Canada's foreign policy is very much influenced by our policy of multiculturalism. We promote peace and human rights internationally and we play a significant role in peace-keeping missions in the troubled spots of the world. The international community believes in what we say, because we are implementing within our own borders the policies that we advocate abroad.

Honourable senators, I conclude by asking you to lend your support to this amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks. I do not propose to vote against this bill, but I have had certain views for a long time and it is perhaps appropriate for me to give expression to them now. To put it bluntly, I do not believe in a policy of multiculturalism.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Hicks: I wish that we in Canada would try to evolve toward a Canadian culture.

Senator Haidasz: There is no difference!

Senator Doody: That includes Newfoundlanders, too.

Senator Hicks: I think that people who have elected to come here from many other parts of the world should want to be Canadians. Certainly, their background and heritage will have something to do with and enhance the contributions they make to Canada. I am sometimes afraid that we are trying so hard to promote every small group of people as a separate entity in our country that we are forgetting that the greatness of Canada can only be assured by persons who become Canadians.

I do not like to be referred to as an English-Canadian. I am not an English-Canadian. No one in my background has been born in England for nearly three centuries. I have ancestors of French extraction, German extraction, Welsh extraction as well as English, but I like to think of myself as a Canadian. I should like to think that the people who come to Canada come to Canada because they want to be Canadians. I do not ask them to forget their origins or their ancestors in Europe or Asia or Africa or wherever it may be. I should like to see us stress the development and evolution of a Canadian culture rather than a myriad of cultures which I do not believe unite us, notwithstanding the quotations given by Senator Bosa. I think they tend to separate us and to divide us into small groups.

So I am for Canada and I am for a culture which will, I hope, some day develop as a Canadian culture. Let us stop trying to prevent the emergence of a Canadian culture by spending so much time accentuating the differences that exist among Canadians rather than the things which Canadians have in common.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I support Senator Hicks in what he has said. I, too, will vote for this bill. I think that what Senator Hicks has just described is a natural process. Culture is not something that you can put into compartments. To exist, culture has to have freedom to mingle, and one of the most wonderful things about Canada is the freedom for various cultures to mingle. When asked, I say to Greek groups that I personally am opposed to multiculturalism. I have taken this conviction so far as not to teach my children Greek. I want them to know French and English and, if they have time, to learn other languages of their choice, but while they are small and I am responsible for their education I want them to know the two main cultures and languages of Canada.

I am second to none, and obviously not second to Senator Hicks, in appreciating what other cultures have brought to Canada. The honourable senator is perfectly right when he says that those of us who have come here have come here to be Canadians. We may not be assimilated in the first generation, but we dislike that hyphen. I personally dislike it intensely. Senator Hicks has made a major contribution to this debate.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a Newfoundland-Canadian and a relatively new Canadian, I will take the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Perrault: The Newfoundland multicultural society!
On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Barootes).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, today I had a conversation with Senator Barootes. He called me.

Senator Doody: What did he call you?

Senator Frith: He called me "my friend". He had read in Debates of the Senate the statement I made that I hoped we could deal with this matter next Tuesday. He informed me that he cannot be here next Tuesday.

I agreed that I would make it clear that he has some remarks he wishes to make about his concerns on this bill. I explained to him that Senator Doody had been canvassing the possibility of the Senate's not sitting on Wednesday or Thursday in order to give committees an opportunity to deal with the government business before them. Senator Barootes agrees to reserve his comments for the committee. That means that we could refer the bill to committee today. However, my request was that we do it on Tuesday. So the order can stand until Tuesday in case someone wants to speak to it. I will be asking for a vote for second reading and for referral to committee on Tuesday next.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Is Senator Frith speaking to this matter as Deputy leader of the Opposition or in his personal capacity, since this is a private member's bill?

Senator Frith: I was speaking as Deputy Leader of the Opposition throughout, because the call Senator Barootes made was to me in my capacity as deputy leader. I used the word "we" in the sense that I used it last week. I am glad to make that clarification. In this case, when I say "us" or "we", I do not intend to speak for all senators, and certainly not for Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Is Senator Frith intimating that the Liberal opposition is supporting this bill as such?

Senator Frith: Yes. I am surprised at the question. I had not realized there was any doubt about that.

Senator Doody: There was none in my mind.

Senator Flynn: I wanted to make it clear, because on some occasions Senator Frith intervenes in his personal capacity while on others he does so in his capacity as deputy leader. I wanted to be sure of which capacity he was speaking in now.

Senator Frith: I will try to make that clear every time.
Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on 25th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, has anyone heard from Senator Corbin as to whether he will speak to this order next week? Does the Deputy Leader of the Opposition know whether he will be in attendance next Tuesday?

Hon. Charles McElman: At the moment he is with the Fisheries Committee in New Brunswick.

Senator Flynn: I was fishing myself.

Senator McElman: Did you catch anything?

Senator Perrault: You are just trying to catch a red herring.
Order stands.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN)—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill S-16, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn).—(Honourable Senator David).

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, as agreed with Senator Haidasz and Senator Phillips and with your leave, I would like to speak today in this debate. When I finish my speech, I would like to adjourn the debate on behalf of Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton).

Honourable senators, Bill S-16 is for me an opportunity to give you my personal thoughts on a delicate, complex and controversial subject: abortion. Although I share the principles on which Senator Haidasz's position is based, I must dissociate myself from his position, speaking as a parliamentarian who seeks a political compromise acceptable to the entire country. As part of this conciliatory exercise, I would like to explain why I think the way I do.

Honourable senators, there is a tendency to narrow the debate on abortion down to two conflicting rights: the rights of the woman and the rights of the fetus.

To me, this debate goes far beyond these two issues. The basic question is life itself.

The word "life" has personal, moral, spiritual, philosophical, biological, scientific, medical, historic, social, political and legal implications.

It is probably because life is such a broad concept that abortion is such a complex issue, and that no legislation will ever succeed in setting satisfactory criteria.

In June 1987, I heard a remarkable lecture by Professor Hubert Reeves on the origins of the earth. Science talks about millions of years and provides the evidence, but the origins remain a mystery.

The same applies to the origins of human life. It may be the tragedy of our time that we will not accept mystery and insist on seeking the answer in all kinds of theories and scientific hypotheses.

Honourable senators, I am thinking of our almost desperate attempts to establish a difference between the inception of life and the inception of a human being.

In the confrontation between "potential" and "actual", some people maintain that life and the human being are present at the moment of conception, and others argue that a human being becomes identifiable as such after a varying number of weeks.

I share the view of scientists who maintain that life begins at conception. The resulting human being is as old as the stage of his development, which may be one day, or four, twelve, twenty-four or thirty-six weeks.

The male sperm cell and the female egg cell are the cells that initiate life. Together they contain the forty-eight chromosomes in which all the characteristics of a new human being are present. 50 per cent of the genetic content comes from the mother and 50 per cent from the father.

During her fertile years, a woman regularly prepares her uterus for the few days each month when it can receive an egg cell that may be fertilized by a man's sperm. These reproductive cells are the necessary components of life. Whether reproduction is natural or, as is now sometimes the case, artificial, the result is the life of a human being. The cells will develop further and become an embryo, a fetus, and finally a baby.

The spontaneous or intentional destruction of this union of cells, at whatever stage of development, is, whether we like it or not, a destruction of the life that is needed to build a human being.

With the progress of scientific knowledge, researchers have discovered a vast range of birth control methods to prevent fertilization, to program it or in some cases make it more efficient and even initiate it in the laboratory. Thus, women and men have the option of becoming temporarily or permanently sterile. These methods are not all 100 per cent effective, and in cases when they were not effective or were not used, abortion has become the ultimate method in our civilization to deal with an unwanted pregnancy.

In an open letter published in Le Figaro on September 19, 1981, Mr. Pierre P. Grassé, former president of the French Academy of Science, said the following to President François Mitterrand of France:

There is no pre-human period in our life cycle. The embryo contains all the characteristics of a human being in condensed form.

In an admirable article, philosopher Louis Valcke wrote the following:

The problem is at what point we agree that an individual has developed sufficiently to be legitimately qualified as a human being. Who will determine, who will draw the line between potential and actual characteristics, the line nevertheless must be drawn between non-human, pre-human and fully human? Who are we to determine someone else's humanity . . .

[English]

The burning question is when a fetus becomes a person, and only the Parliament can furnish an authoritative response.

[Translation]

In my opinion, the government cannot decide this question, for lack of scientific evidence.

Honourable senators, for 25 centuries, medical ethics has pursued the same objective of absolute respect for life. Let us mention a few examples; Senator Haidasz quoted some others:

Hippocrates lived from 460 to 377 B.C.:

I will give no woman an abortifacient.

Asaph, a Jewish physician of the 7th century:

Do not give a pregnant woman an abortive potion to drink.

Lusitanus, a Portuguese physician of the 16th century:

No woman had an abortion with my help.

And finally, the Genesis Oath (September 1948):

I will maintain absolute respect for human life, from conception.

These quotations show that beyond religion, politics, ideology and historical period, medicine has always had the obligation to respect life under all circumstances, from beginning to end.

In this context, society must accept the fact that most physicians, whose calling is to protect human life, refuse to perform abortions, which destroy it. In order to avoid this fundamental principle of medical ethics, scientists, researchers and even physicians try to justify what they do by not considering the embryo or fetus a human being in its first weeks or months. Hence, there is a new debate to determine the difference between the cellular stage of life and the precise moment when these cells become a human being.

Our consciences would be greatly relieved if science could answer this question. Such is not the case. We can break the laws of biology, but they can neither be denied nor changed. That is why for me, as for thousands of physicians, abortion in itself is a medically unethical act. I believe that such a principle should be clearly stated by the legislators.

Honourable senators, I think that the importance of the legal vacuum created by the Supreme Court decision of January 28, 1988, has been greatly exaggerated. In fact, for many years, the part of the law judged unconstitutional had been violated by the courts, physicians, professionals and the public.

Let me explain: so-called therapeutic abortions had to be approved individually by a committee in hospitals where abortions were performed. We know that private or public clinics went ahead without such a committee and that gradually the term "therapeutic" was broadened so that it ended up meaning abortion on demand for any unwanted pregnancy.

The decision of the Supreme Court resulted in two developments: abolish therapeutic abortion committees and decriminalize abortion. However, for all practical purposes, they will not change much the reality of the present situation. On the other hand, this ruling raises again the whole issue of abortion. As always in the past, this debate deals essentially with the morality of abortion in our society. This debate has now focused on two extreme positions: its rejection by Pro-Life people, and its acceptance by Pro-Choice people.

Caught between these two extremes, the Canadian people are relying on the state to arbitrate and reconcile their differences. It is already possible to foresee compromise legislation which some will deem too permissive and others too restrictive.

For reasons which are quite evident, honourable senators, the democratic state must take into account the evolution of its society. It reflects its aspirations, behaviours, demands and needs. On the abortion issue, our society itself is painfully divided.

For some, modern society is showing early or already real signs of decadence. For others, it is progressing towards freedom by demonstrating an increased awareness of individual rights. Paradoxically, a materialistic, egotistic and individual-centred philosophy has become increasingly dependent on the state to recognize the rights of the individuals, to guarantee their freedoms and to meet their needs.

Abortion is an example of this change and can be described as the unwillingness to accept the consequences of a freely accepted act.

Honourable senators, it is really abnormal that this debate should attract so much attention at a time when really effective means of contraception and family planning are so readily available. If we add up the pill, the diaphragm, the shield, as well as such surgical means as the vasectomy, the ligature of the Fallopian tubes, and the prophylactic hysterectomy, it is no wonder that in our industrialized nations, wealthy and supposedly civilized, the birth rate is going down constantly.

Dr. Marcel Boulanger stated recently:

Technological breakthroughs place us in difficult situations. How could we justify the enormous amounts of money spent to fertilize the infertile and sterilize the fertile? Why do we agonizingly ponder upon the sterilization of the mentally handicapped while strangely we are no longer concerned about the sterilization of normal people?

Canada has a birth rate which, at 1.7, is inadequate simply to maintain the current level of population. If we add to this deficit the 60,000 estimated abortions performed in 1987, we are faced with a reality which seriously threatens the future of our nation. Over the past 10 years, Canada has already lost 600,000 people to abortion. In 20 years, this will mean 1,200,000, and over the average lifetime of an individual 72 years of age, this would mean 4,320,000 individuals. What a waste!

This global decrease in the birth rate also denotes a society where the transmission of life is no longer a priority. In his reflections on life, Dr. Alexis Carrel wrote in 1950:

The decrease in the birth rate is a degenerative disease which affects all civilizations. It caused the decline of ancient Greece and the Roman Empire. It is now devastating modern nations.

Honourable senators, in the 1985 report on therapeutic abortions performed in Canadian accredited hospitals in accordance with the legislation enacted on August 26, 1969, we see that since 1978 their number has gone from a minimum of 60,956 in 1985 to a maximum of 66,319 in 1982.

In 1985, the abortion picture in Canada was as follows: for every hundred live births, there were 16.2 abortions; out of 250 accredited hospitals, only 39 or 15.4 per cent performed three fourths or 74.4 per cent of all recorded abortions.

Honourable senators, a very brief summary shows that, out of 100 women who have an abortion, 89 per cent get it during the first 12 weeks; 77 per cent go to a hospital external clinic; 67 per cent are single; 55 per cent are between 20 and 29 years old; 23 per cent are 19 or younger; 22 per cent are 30 or older, and 20 per cent had at least one previous abortion.

I think we should take those facts into account in coming up with realistic legislation.

Honourable senators, the women's revolution of the past 30 years has had its impact, including the demand for reproductive freedom. I often wonder what would have become of the revenge of the cradle in Quebec if such a right had existed and if our parents and ancestors had been able to benefit from the same means of contraception as our children.

The irreversible move towards women's liberation is a sign of progress and deserves our support, understanding and adjustment. I dispute however the notion that the human life borne by the mother belongs to her exclusively. That life belongs to the father in equal proportion and to society as well, which is responsible for its protection. Biology being what it is, the exclusive role of women in pregnancy and childbearing is not about to change. And when a life, fathered by no matter whom, is developing within a woman, she is responsible for that life. Out of basic, natural human morality, that life must be protected and, in my view, it has precedence over the ownership right of disposal. And indeed this is why, over thousands of years, so many philosophers, moralists, theologians and physicians have condemned abortion and a great many religions have considered the life of the unborn as an absolute right.

Lawmakers must however adopt legislation which is consistent with the evolution of society. The fact that abortion is not a crime has been confirmed by the highest court in the land. To me, abortion in itself remains condemnable, but not the woman who undergoes abortion. To break the deadlock, legislators must imagine constraints which are respectful of the rights of women, of the fetus, of the physician and of an important part of society.

I would like to submit the following quotes from a very balanced article by Mary Eastman published in the April 11, 1988 edition of the Montreal Gazette:

● (1450)

[English]

...an abortion law can be a middle way between the ethical extremes of total prohibition, untenable when hard cases render it morally tolerable, and abortion on demand, which tends to repel the moral sensibilities of a pluralist society...

The killing of the unborn as a solution to social problems must be regarded as a colossal human failure, both sociably and personally...

[Senator David.]

Abortion is not more a labor issue than it is a feminist issue. It is a total human issue that strikes at the heart of our deepest convictions about the nature of human life...

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the legislation should, in my opinion, take into consideration the principles we have put forward, the Supreme Court's ruling, Statistics Canada data and the change of attitudes in our society. The only solution seems to be, under the circumstances, to give women the moral responsibility to choose according to their conscience.

Since abortion is contrary to medical ethics because it does not prevent sickness, alleviate symptoms nor heal a sick organ, and since, furthermore, it entails the taking of a human life, I question its place in the national health program. Through a different program, we could share with the provinces expenses incurred in specific circumstances, for example, when the mother's life is threatened by her pregnancy, although we know that, with the sophistication of medical science, these cases are extremely rare; when the pregnancy results from incest or rape (that is, psychological or physical violence). when a pregnancy occurs at the age of 17 or younger, and assuming, I repeat assuming, a lack of information on these matters, a lack of informed consent and a lack of maturity; when the mother's mental faculties diminish her responsibility for her actions; when a test shows the presence of a serious genetic disease in the fetus.

In other cases I see no logical reason for requiring the entire population to finance a medical program for an operation that goes against medical ethics, against the moral convictions of many Canadians and against the best interests of this country.

Honourable senators, since abortion contributes to the decline in the birth rate, with predictable consequences, I think it is urgent that we in Canada develop a consistent, generous and dynamic family policy. The first step might be to create a Department of the Family within the federal government and within each provincial government.

To reduce the number of abortions, we could have a campaign to educate the public, as a preventive measure, so that this practically foolproof technique that is becoming the ultimate birth control method will not become increasingly wide spread.

On the positive side, the federal government could take steps, with its provincial partners, to eliminate the irritants that are perceived as obstacles by couples who want to have a child.

By actively supporting the family, all sectors in our society could afford special status to couples who take on the responsibility of bringing children into this world. If we consider children as the most precious investment we have, perhaps the time has come to consider effective ways of revising our laws, our social structures, our housing policies, our taxation system, our day-care system, maternity leave, working hours, benefits for mothers who stay home and for those who work outside the home.

Positive action means that governments would have to change quickly their legislation and regulations, so that couples who want to adopt a child can do so within a reasonable period of time, which could, for instance, be that of a normal pregnancy, and not three or four years as is the case today.

Honourable senators, I think the following five points would adequately summarize my speech:—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator David, could you perhaps slow down when enumerating those five points?

Senator David: Certainly, Senator Frith. First, our legislation should recognize that life is a continuum that starts with fertilization and that the development of the resulting human being starts at that moment.

Second, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, in my view, decriminalizes abortion, reflecting a development that is typical of most modern and democratic societies in the western world.

Third, for compassionate reasons related to the particular circumstances, I suggested five examples of exceptions where government financial assistance seems justifiable to me.

Fourth, in all cases of abortion, the moral, and not criminal, responsibility should be a matter of conscience for the woman who undergoes the operation and the physician who performs it. My personal conviction is that abortion in itself is to be condemned. However, I cannot and will not condemn women who decide to have an abortion.

Fifth, I suggest that a Department of the Family be created in Canada and in every province to promote the family and decrease the use of abortion as a solution to unwanted pregnancies.

Honourable senators, Bill S-16 presented by Senator Haidasz would again criminalize abortion and impose life imprisonment on someone who performs an abortion and a two-year prison term on a woman who undergoes one. In my opinion, this contradicts the Supreme Court decision of January 28, 1988 as well as the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Although sharing the principles underlying this bill, a parliamentary must, I believe, consider the social reality and adopt an attitude of openness towards a woman who takes moral responsibility for her decision.

For these reasons, I am sorry that I cannot support Bill S-16.

In seeking a reasonable compromise between rigid fundamental principles and flexible human compassion, I tried to suggest the basis for future legislation that would seem acceptable to me.

Thank you, honourable senators, for your kind attention.

• (1500)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I found Senator David's comments very moving. Without any contentious intentions I would like, however, to make a few points. First, when he referred to Ancient Greece, there are no valid statistics to support the view that the people—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, is Senator Gigantès putting a question or rising in debate?

Senator Gigantès: I am rising in debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, would Senator Gigantès give me an opportunity to put a question to Senator David?

If I followed correctly the five items you mentioned, the third one includes five exceptions. Could you rapidly review those exceptions? I did not quite follow the principle from which flow those five exceptions.

Senator David: Senator Frith, you understood perfectly that I strived to avoid going either too far or not far enough when saying that in my view abortion is not part of a national health program, and when suggesting another program, I am recognizing that in any program, either one, five exceptions would be acceptable at least in my own conscience. There might be six, but in my own observations, thoughts and readings, I recognized those five exceptions as valid ones.

Senator Frith, I am not sure whether I answered your question, but I can repeat those five exceptions for your benefit.

Senator Frith: Well, you just explained there are five exceptions and I can check them in the Debates of the Senate if you wish.

Senator David: Yes, there are five exceptions, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: If I understand correctly, there are five principles and on the third principle there are five exceptions. Did I follow correctly?

Senator David: There are five exceptions for which I would recognize one program or another whereby all Canadians share in the cost of the abortion performed on an individual.

Those five exceptions are five classes of women who get abortions for reasons that in my own conscience I find valid.

Senator Frith: Thank you very much, and you also Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: The more modern testimonies put forward by Senator David to prove his point are valid enough without having to go back to Ancient Greece and Rome.

I mention the history of these two countries not to promote multiculturalism, but because their cultures belong to us all.

There are no reliable statistics on Ancient Greece to know whether its birth rate was very low. We know that the birth rate in Sparta was very low, a situation which could be more easily and credibly attributed to the fact that the citizens of that city were constantly at war and involved in civil strife with their serfs.

Like all the other trading, democratic and open cities, Athens had lost no citizens and was not faced with a low birth rate.

As far as Rome is concerned, a low birth rate was common among the noble families whose members could be elected to the Senate. As a matter of fact, they were complaining that all the families other than the noble ones were faced with a staggeringly high birth rate.

Therefore, Senator David, I beg of you, do not always listen to the Library of Parliament researchers. I do not think they are thoroughly informed on this subject. The low birth rate among senators could be attributable to the fact that they had lead water pipes. There is a theory, based on the examination of their corpses, to the effect that the very high level of lead in their bones may have contributed to their inability to procreate.

Honourable senators, I thank you.

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, just the same I must respond to your intervention by saying that the Parliamentary Library researchers are not in anyway responsible for this assessment which was made by Alexis Carrel, one of the greatest French biologists in the early part of the Twentieth Century and a Nobel prize recipient.

I quoted one of his statements from his book entitled "Reflexions on Life". Also, I have read on several occasions "Man, the Unknown" which has always provided me with food for thought.

I suggest that between two philosophers, I can consider Alexis Carrel as a highly competent individual.

Senator Gigantès: Competent, marvelous and quite eloquent. His book is superbe, but unfortunately he wrote it before a number of new archeological techniques were developed. Some were left in the excavation!

Hon. Michel Cogger: If there were no statistical data, how do you know that?

Senator Gigantès: I am an archeologist by trade, dear Senator Cogger.

So, I am grateful for your fine intervention.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, a few minutes ago Senator David said that an abortion should be the moral responsibility of the pregnant woman. If that is correct, I should like to ask Senator David this: Does he mean by that that it is moral for a pregnant woman to take the life or to permit the taking of the life of an unborn child?

● (1510)

Senator David: Well, senator, I doubt that that is the main problem we have to deal with.

Senator Haidasz: It is the crux.

Senator David: You have your morals, I have my morals, and the wife who is pregnant has her morals, and I think that if they can achieve an equilibrium between all our morals the legislators will be lucky.

Senator Haidasz: The Criminal Code has a sanction against murder or the taking of human life.

Senator David, will you also ask for an amendment of the Criminal Code to remove that sanction and allow murder to be just an individual, personal moral responsibility?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Phillips: I thought you already did that!

Senator Doody: If no other senator intends to speak on this order, I shall adjourn it in the name of Senator Macdonald.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION TO TRANSMIT COPY OF SENATE RESOLUTION TO LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES AND FOUR NATIONAL ABORIGINAL ORGANIZATIONS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C.:

That the Honourable the Speaker do transmit to the Legislative Assembly of each province a copy of the Resolution to amend the Constitution of Canada, adopted by the Senate on 21st April, 1988, and urge that the provinces do likewise; and

That a copy of the said Resolution be transmitted by the Honourable the Speaker to the Legislative Assemblies of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories and to the four National Organizations representing the aboriginal peoples of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, as the seconder of this motion, I want to inquire of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate about the intentions of the government side with regard to this motion.

As the seconder of this motion, I had hoped that we could either pass or vote upon it within some reasonable time. I know that there is a courtesy in this place that some reasonable time be allowed for debate when motions are brought before it, but I wondered if honourable senators would find it reasonable to deal with this next week and, I hope, pass it. As the seconder of it, I should like to see it passed at least the week after next.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that order stands in my name. I noticed with interest Senator Watt's introduction of the motion and waited for some time for him to give his explanation, which I heard yesterday. However, I have not had a chance to read it as yet.

I also indicated, when I was asked about this by Senator Marchand as I came into the chamber, that I intended asking the FPRO office people to let me have their thoughts on this particular motion. It is an interesting one, and one which deserves to be reflected on and discussed. I have no desire to prevent anyone else from speaking. As the seconder of the motion, Senator Marchand can speak any time he wishes—I would only be too happy to yield.

As soon as I have my material prepared I will certainly speak on it. In the meantime, the option of bringing the matter to a vote is in the hands of the Senate any time it wishes to do so. However, I hope that does not happen before I have a chance to get my research done.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, it is not a matter of my wanting to speak. If I wanted to speak on it, I understand that I could do so. A great deal has already been said on this whole question of the Meech Lake Accord. This motion, which I seconded for Senator Watt, is a clear indication that the matter of the amendments we put forward from our side should be sent off to the legislatures and legislative councils of the territories. That is quite clear.

All I am saying is that, after some reasonable period of time has passed and the government has had an opportunity to have a look at it, it would be reasonable to take action on it. I should like to see some action taken on it before too long.

Senator Doody: I have no quarrel with that, Senator Marchand. Certainly, the definition of the word "reasonable" is one that can be discussed from time to time, but I have no intention of trying to delay the progress of the motion. I noticed that it was spoken to on June 15.

In any event, I will undertake to try to move as quickly as I can to get the information I asked for, and I will speak on it as soon as I possibly can.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody advised me that Senator Ottenheimer wished to make an intervention on this order, and I am glad to yield to him and then move the adjournment.

Hon. Gerald Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith.

I shall be quite brief on this, but I would like to speak for a few minutes with respect to the motion of the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, which states:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The position of the opposition was outlined by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and is found in Hansard of June 7. To refresh honourable senators' memories, I shall take a few quotations from it.

The honourable senator asked "whether there is any advantage at this time in initiating a pre-study of the free trade bill." He went on to point out that the Senate committee was engaged, and had been for six months, in the examination of the subject matter of the bill, which is the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States. He also pointed out that "the Free Trade Agreement and the legislation are about the same thing," and then stated:

Giving the committee a further reference at this time, in my opinion, will not achieve any additional benefit.

I think that I have fairly—without being selective or trying to colour anything—synopsized from the honourable gentleman's own words the major point that he made.

Indeed, there would be benefit for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and, therefore, benefit for the institution, the Senate itself, to study Bill C-130.

● (1520)

Some years ago that committee studied free trade in its general context—there was no Free Trade Agreement or Bill C-130, but it was a conceptual consideration of it. For the past six months the committee has studied the Free Trade Agreement, which is an intergovernmental agreement, and obviously much more specific than a general, conceptual debate on free trade.

The committee and the Senate are now in a position where they have a projected, specific piece of legislation. While it is true, obviously, that the projected legislation is to incorporate the agreement and that the agreement is one which, in the honourable gentleman's own words, will be the subject matter of this legislation, is it not a valid principle that, when it is possible to do so, the committee should examine as specific a reference as possible? In other words, why continue to study a projected intergovernmental agreement when the draft legislation which will incorporate it is available? Surely there is nothing that the committee is now empowered to do that it could not do if Bill C-130 were referred to it.

The honourable gentleman, in putting forward the views of the opposition, stated:

... we must point out that the Senate has in fact been carefully studying the agreement for upwards of six months now. All that work is money in the bank, so to speak, to be drawn upon when we actually have the legislation.

Perhaps if I could push that metaphor just a little bit further, no doubt it is money in the bank, but I think it is a non-interest-bearing account and, if the committee were dealing specifically with Bill C-130, the same money would be in the bank, but I think it would accrue some interest to the Senate, and then, perhaps, to the people of Canada as well.

Therefore, honourable senators, when it is possible to be specific and to have the specific document that eventually the Senate will be required to vote upon, it appears to me to be inconsistent to deal with something less than or other than that specific document, when, in so doing, nothing that can now be done is precluded. The subject matter is the same, but one is an agreement and the other is projected legislation. Therefore, I would suggest that dealing with the projected legislation would, in the end, be more beneficial.

It seems to me that the perception of the Senate is perhaps something like the perception of justice: not only that something be done but that it be seen to be done. For those members of the public who are interested in what we do—and they are probably not the great majority of the people in Canada—if that committee were dealing with the specific, proposed legislation, we would also be perceived to be dealing directly with legislation that will eventually be before us rather than with an intergovernmental agreement—something that, as such, will not be passed by this chamber.

Therefore, from a legislative point of view, I can see no disadvantage or negative aspect in referring the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. In my opinion, there is nothing that the committee will be precluded from doing on an examination of Bill C-130 in comparison to what it is now doing. Moreover, as I said before, not only will the committee be directly considering Bill C-130; it will be seen to be directly considering that bill. It might perhaps be said that appearances are not important, but there are many people who have grave doubts about the value of what is done in this chamber and perhaps we owe it to ourselves and to them to be conscious of their perception of this chamber and its activities. Therefore, if the committee is considering Bill C-130 rather than the agreement, I think the perception will be more concrete, more relevant and more real.

Honourable senators, this chamber is obviously not only a legislative chamber; it is a political chamber. I want to make it clear that, when I say that an institution is political or that someone does something politically, I do not mean that in a pejorative way. Any honourable senator who has spent a number of years in either a federal or a provincial legislature, or government, or has been involved in any way with the political process should not, in my opinion, take umbrage when someone uses the word “political” and jump to the conclusion that that is a pejorative term. There is nothing wrong with saying that this is a political forum as well as a legislative forum and that people act politically as well as legislatively. I would suggest, therefore, that there is no legislative reason to vote against the motion for pre-study. However, if this is being done for political reasons, then that is another matter. I hasten to repeat that I do not use that term pejoratively. I am sure that the honourable gentleman, who has spent more years in elected politics than most of us here, would agree that the word “political” when attributed to a forum is not a pejorative term. It is simply different. Most of us here in this chamber are politicians as well as legislators.

Therefore, if we knew that a political decision had been made to deny pre-study of this bill, then perhaps we could save ourselves a great deal of time, because we all know where the majority in this chamber lies. However, I understand from the speech that was made by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that that decision has not been made; that we are, in fact, in a state of limbo. However, even theologians today worry about limbo. Most people would say we either go up or go down, if, in fact, we go anywhere. Perhaps, in the interests of all of us here, we should get out of limbo. If there are political reasons for this decision, then, obviously, 60 always out-votes 30, and at least we would know what the situation was and the people of country would also know.

Honourable senators, it is a fact that the Speaker of the House of Commons has ruled in favour of the presentation of Bill C-130 in its present form and against a point of order with respect to its division. However, that does not mean that a similar point of order could not be raised in this chamber. Perhaps it is speculation on my part, but one would assume that the same decision would be made on a similar point of order if it were raised in this chamber.

Another possibility can be exemplified by the reversal of the decision of the Chair a few days ago with respect to the division of the bill on ACOA. In other words, the ruling of the Chair in the Senate could then be reversed by the use of the majority in the Senate and we would all then be in a great procedural—

Senator MacEachen: Limbo?

Senator Ottenheimer: —limbo, yes, exactly—

Senator MacEachen: You get there no matter what you do.

Senator Ottenheimer: Yes. I think the honourable gentleman wants to keep us there in limbo.

Senator Frith: All roads lead to limbo!

Senator Ottenheimer: However, honourable senators, in the final analysis, what it comes down to is that from a legislative point of view there is nothing the committee could not do when considering Bill C-130 that it can now do. If for no other reason than from the point of view of the perception of what is being done by the committee and by the Senate, let us make our reference as specific as possible, now that we are in a position to make a reference with respect to a specific piece of legislation. That appears to me to make reasonably good sense.

On the other hand, in light of the fact that this is not only a legislative forum but also a political forum, if the political rather than the legislative perspective has taken the priority for the time being, then perhaps that should be made clear and, since we are all presumably reasonably good at arithmetic, we might as well dispense with the matter.

Honourable senators, my final point is that this matter should be voted on fairly soon so that we, and the people of this country, will know where we stand.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate. In so doing I want to make it clear that, while I think Senator Ottenheimer has a misconception of the relationship between the Free Trade Agreement and the legislation, both here and in the United States, I do not want to expand on that at this time. However, if other senators want to intervene in the debate, although it is adjourned in my name, they are welcome to do so.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 16, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

FIFTY-SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee notes that the Senate and the House of Commons have been advised by Treasury Board that improvements to the Government-paid insurance (PSMIP) are extended to both Houses of Parliament should Senators and Members of the House of Commons wish to take advantage of these benefits. The House of Commons had advised the Senate that these improvements will be extended to their Members.

The maximum incremental annual costs to the Government for these improvements based on 104 Senators would be approximately $8,500.00.

The effective date of these benefits will be communicated to Senators as soon as Treasury Board informs the Senate.

Your Committee recommends that the extension of these improvements to the PSMIP Plan to Senators be approved.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in essence, the report involves an improvement to the pensions for Members of Parliament, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, and deals with the rather small amount of increase that will be borne by the Treasury Board with regard to that improvement. The matter came before the committee today.

Senator Doody: Are you referring to insurance or pensions?

Senator Frith: I am sorry, it should be insurance.

Senator Doody: You got my heart pumping there.

Senator McElman: I could see you were very excited!

Senator Frith: Yes. I do not propose that we deal with the report today. In essence, the report makes a recommendation, and I shall be moving that we accept that recommendation on Tuesday; so we have the weekend to study the report.

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 21, 1988, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX*(See p. 3685)*

ADDRESS
OF
HIS EXCELLENCY DR. HELMUT KOHL
CHANCELLOR OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY
TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS
IN THE
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA
ON THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1988

The Chancellor was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Chancellor, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Members of the Parliament of Canada, I have today the honour of welcoming among us the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, His Excellency Helmut Kohl.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: His visit reminds us of and strengthens the ties that exist between our countries. We are partners in peace, partners in prosperity and partners in progress. The defence of Canada begins in the Federal Republic of Germany. More than 7,000 Canadian troops are stationed in the Federal Republic at Lahr and Baden. They stand the first watch on the front line of freedom.

[Translation]

We are partners in the Economic Summit group of leading industrialized nations, meeting in Canada next week in our great city of Toronto, a showcase of the Canadian economy.

In the Economic summit group, in the G-7, in the OECD, in the GATT, and other forums of the international community, Canada and the Federal Republic are often advocates of the same cause—from trade liberalization, to easing the debt burdens of the Third World.

Canada and the Federal Republic are trading nations, equally dependent on securing existing markets and creating new ones. We both depend on liberalized trade. We both suffer when protectionism grows.

The Federal Republic is our fourth largest trading partner, with two-way trade of $5 billion last year.

[English]

Shared and long-standing bonds of kinship and partnership between our two peoples and countries are the very foundation of our Atlantic bridge. Three hundred and twenty-five years ago, Hans Bernard purchased land near Québec City and became the first recorded German settler in Canada. Then followed the Irish.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Lots of them.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: But waves of colonists from Germany followed him to make a homeland in a land of new opportunity. Canada has been enriched beyond measure by the contributions of Canadians of German heritage to the political, social and economic fabric of our country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, Canada's thirteenth Prime Minister and an illustrious Leader of my Party in the House of Commons, traced his ancestral roots to Germany. He would be very proud, Sir, of your presence here today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Today, many Hon. Members from both sides of the House are proud, very proud, of their German ancestry. In our Cabinet, Frank Oberle as our Minister of State for Science and Technology, helping to steer our nation through the high technology frontier of a new decade and a new century, was born in Forchheim in your country and came at the age of 19 to ours, eventually settling in Chetwynd, British Columbia. You lost a vote, and I got one.

His, Chancellor, is the story of 8 million Canadians, almost one-third of our citizens, whose mother tongue is neither English nor French. Indeed, it is the story of Canada itself, a nation of immigrants, a land of promise, a people of hope. Altogether, well over 2 million Canadians trace their roots to Germany, the largest group of origin after English and French-speaking Canadians. Ours is a nation of two languages and many cultures. Shared values and hopes stir us individually and collectively to seize the courage and the vision to challenge the uncertainty of our times.

In the past, the friendship between our two peoples has been interrupted by war. But today we recognize more than ever that we live in a time when war is, as you have said, absolutely unthinkable. We know that it is better to live with one another in peace and prosperity in a more interdependent world.

Under Chancellor Kohl's vigorous direction, the Federal Republic has resumed a vital leadership role in addressing issues on the global agenda. I have been present at many meetings of heads of government where security and strategic considerations have been paramount. I have not heard an analysis more cogent and thoughtful than that put forward by Chancellor Kohl. He brings to these discussions a unique and incisive understanding of both the challenges and the opportunities associated with the vital East-West relationship. His is a voice of reason. His message is one of clarity and strength. On behalf of all Canadians I salute you for that today, Chancellor.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The Federal Republic under Chancellor Kohl has made protection of the environment one of its most pressing priorities.

[Translation]

In the Federal Republic, as well as in Canada, environmental concerns are in the mainstream of public opinion, and the environmental agenda is in the mainstream of public policy. The Federal Republic is a signatory of the Montreal Accord to arrest the dangerous deterioration of the ozone layer. And we welcome German participation in the International Conference on the Atmosphere which Canada will be hosting in Toronto at the end of this month.

From our private discussions since your arrival, Chancellor, I know that we have similar objectives for the multilateral and bilateral agenda before us. At the Toronto Summit next week, we will cooperate with other Summit countries to maintain the present climate of non-inflationary growth, while at the same time helping to reduce the imbalances in the world economy. We will be encouraging our Summit partners to undertake additional measures to reduce structural rigidities in all of our economies.

[English]

We all recognize that the agricultural trading system requires fundamental reform. We share a deep concern that the Third World debt has reached an astronomical sum of a trillion dollars. We know that you share our concern for the poorest of the poor and are taking steps, as we have, to alleviate the debt of the hard-pressed African states.

Our commitment to an enhanced multilateral trading system is the cornerstone, and it always has been, of Canadian policy. At the core of this system is the current set of multilateral trade negotiations and the need to come to grips with the acute problems which exist in the area of agricultural trade.

I have twice visited you, Chancellor Kohl, in your capital, and now it is my privilege to welcome you to ours. This is a historic occasion, as well as a very happy one. Your visit marks the first time ever that a Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany has spoken to our Parliament.

You, Sir, are welcomed here as a friend, a good and a valuable friend of Canada. I bid you, Mrs. Kohl, and every member of your delegation, a very warm welcome. I invite you now, Sir, to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Dr. Helmut Kohl (Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Prime Minister, ladies and gentlemen, thank you for your kind applause and welcome. I should like to express my appreciation to you, Prime Minister, for your kind and friendly words of welcome. These were words of welcome, but they were also expressing a sense of friendship. I warmly reciprocate and return these feelings.

I am most grateful, Mr. Speakers, and Members of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, for having invited me to address you here today in this venerable building which, since Confederation was formed in 1867, has been the seat of Canadian Parliament. This is the first time, and you said so, Prime Minister, that a head of government of the Federal Republic of Germany and of a country which currently holds the presidency of the European Community has been afforded such an opportunity to address you here. Therefore, I regard your invitation not only as a special honour for my country but also as a token of your solidarity with Europe as it progresses toward union.

I wish to convey to you, Members of Parliament, my warmest greetings from my fellow countrymen in the Federal Republic of Germany and of Europe.

You, Prime Minister, since the days that you participated in your first summit have played a most helpful role in bridging differences of approach among the partners participating in the economic summit. You have made an essential contribution toward enlarging the G-5, which today includes Canada as well, for the development of international economics. This was certainly an essential step.

In many of our meetings I have been struck again and again by your effort to contribute toward progress and to produce acts of solidarity, and in this way bring about solidarity among the participants in these meetings. I congratulate you as well for concluding the free trade agreement with the United States of America. This is a forward-looking sign. The European Economic Community, in 1992, will establish a single domestic market for 320 million people, an area not in terms of population but in terms of economic potential, which will be the strongest region. If this becomes a reality we will need particularly close consultation and relationship with the United States and Canada, and in particular with that important area in South-East Asia with Japan at the centre. These are the three important regions in international economic relations. I welcome the fact that Canada and we, the Federal Republic of Germany, have particularly close contacts and will help to promote this wonderful development.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: Your country, Canada, has always cultivated her political, economic, and human ties with Europe; intellectual and cultural life are rooted in European tradition. Your Prime Minister referred already to the fact that the great majority of your people are descendants of European immigrants. Since the middle of the 18th century and particularly following the devastating wars of this century, the First and the Second World War, countless Germans have emigrated to Canada.

Here they sought freedom and found freedom, political and personal freedom, freedom from poverty, and freedom from the constraints of the old continent. Those immigrants and their descendants, who today count for probably one-tenth of the population of Canada, have played a large part in your country's economic, technological, and cultural development. They have, and we are happy and delighted at it, preserved their links with their relatives and friends in their native countries, and they are proud of their new home country of Canada.

European visitors in particular are always impressed when they see how Canadians of different origin, and above all those whose roots are in western, eastern, southern and central Europe, live and work together harmoniously in their new homelands, and how, on the basis of the country's federal structure, they preserve the cultural heritage and traditions of their native countries whilst building their common future here in Canada, their new home country.

Here in Canada you have already achieved, to a large extent, what we in one part of Europe, the Community of the Twelve—and this is only part of Europe, the larger part of Europe, which for different reasons cannot yet join those who have formed the European community—are striding towards, sometimes with little steps, sometimes with big steps, namely, unity in diversity.

But let me also say to Canadians of eastern European origins here in this place: We have not forgotten your native countries either! When we speak of Europe, we always have in mind the whole of Europe, east and west of the Iron Curtain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: For this reason the central aim of the policy pursued by my Government, the policy of our friends and allies, is to overcome the division of Europe, and this includes the division of our German fatherland; to make the frontiers more permeable; to reunite separated families and facilitate human contacts; and to develop a lasting and equitable peaceful order in Europe in which all nations themselves can determine their own future and cultivate their relations in freedom.

Mr. Speaker, the free democracies of Europe and North America are linked by their common commitment to the inalienable human rights and to the principles of freedom and democracy enshrined in their constitutions, to the openness of their communities, and together we are resolved to defend our freedom. For my country, the Federal Republic of Germany, this is the basis of our policy.

The trans-Atlantic Alliance, NATO, the alliance of free democracies has, for over 40 years now, preserved the common peace, the common security, and the common freedom.

In this building a chapel reminds us that twice in this century citizens of your country have fought and sacrificed their lives in Europe. Only those who know the devastations of war, the disasters of war, can truly appreciate the fact that our Alliance has secured for Europe, and for us in the Federal Republic of Germany, the longest period of peace in its more recent history.

This has only been possible, and particularly in difficult phases of relationships between East and West, because the allies have shown the political will and determination to maintain adequate military forces, to pool their defence contributions and thus guarantee their common defence capability.

The North American democracies, at least Canada, have rendered an invaluable contribution to those efforts, especially by stationing troops in Europe, and I wish to take this opportunity here before this high House to express my thanks and appreciation for Canada's military presence in my country, and to express my appreciation and gratitude for the service rendered by your Armed Forces in my country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: Let me also address a word of very personal thanks to all Canadian servicemen and their families, whom I meet again and again when I am in Lahr, the Canadian base, who have lived in our country or are living in our country and fulfilling their defence mission side by side with our own troops in our own country.

This is important for us. We have a conscript army of more than 500,000 young Germans who are serving in that army. For them it is particularly significant and important to know that they stand shoulder to shoulder with comrades from other countries of the free world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: I would also express my gratitude for the opportunities you are offering us in the way of training facilities here in Canada, which we do not have in our own country.

The Alliance's assured defence capability has always been and will be the basis for the other principal task to which we jointly committed ourselves in the Harmel Report 20 years ago. That is the quest for a constructive dialogue and closer co-operation with the countries of the Warsaw Pact, and in particular the pursuit of disarmament and arms control to reduce the stockpile of arms in a sensible disarmament and arms control dialogue.

In this respect, too, Canada has rendered outstanding contributions. Lester Pearson was one of the first of the Alliance's statesmen to begin a dialogue with Moscow.

Canada's commitment in the negotiations on security and co-operation in Europe, especially with regard to human rights, has left its stamp on the documents of Helsinki and Madrid.

Until this very day, your country is playing an active role in the arms control negotiations, particularly in the last months and years.

The correctness of the policy pursued in the name of Harmel has been strikingly confirmed. We are experiencing a dynamic improvement in East-West relations, which most of us would have considered to be inconceivable a few years ago.

Never before in the post-war era have the superpowers conducted such an intensive dialogue at the summit. I have asked for such meetings again and again, without expecting too much in the way of an outcome, but I am certain that summit meetings are a major driving force of East-West relations. I want to express my congratulations to the President of the United States and to General Secretary Gorbachev, and express our wish that that policy should be continued along this line.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: Never before have East and West discussed such a wide variety of subjects and worked together in so many areas as today, in spite of the continuing differences between their systems. We should admit that these differences are still great and considerable.

Seldom before have the possibilities for removing old obstacles to dialogue and co-operation been more promising. I believe there is an opportunity to reduce tensions in important areas. Afghanistan is an illustration of such an area. Above all, we see for the first time that the Soviets are willing to reflect on the threat posed by their superior military strength and their claim to an ideological monopoly, and to seek through negotiation the path to stable and genuine peace with fewer weapons. This is the course the West has always advocated in the last years and decades.

The INF Treaty is a milestone along this road. It stems from a western initiative. It was made possible by the solidarity and cohesion of the Alliance. Hence, it is, in the best sense of the word, our common success.

It is the first treaty in the history of arms control to provide for the destruction of a whole class and category of weapons. Its underlying principle that whoever has more weapons must scrap more, as well as its strict provisions on verification, are a model for further steps toward disarmament.

We can all congratulate ourselves on this treaty having been put into effect, and all of the treaty's provisions must now be strictly implemented within the prescribed time frame so that it can pave the way for further arms control agreements.

Particularly important in this context is a global and comprehensive verifiable ban on chemical weapons. The continuing proliferation and use of these means of mass destruction must be stopped immediately. In this aim we are at one with your country and greatly value Canada's major contributions to the Geneva negotiations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: Nonetheless, the basic problem of security in Europe, not the least the security of the Federal Republic of Germany, continues to be the conventional superiority of the Warsaw Pact, as well as its capability for launching surprise attacks and for initiating large-scale offensive action. Eliminating these capabilities must be the objective of future negotiations on conventional stability throughout Europe, from the Atlantic to the Urals. We are banking on these negotiations commencing before the end of this year. Here again, Canada and we agree.

Another objective of the Alliance is to reduce the American and Soviet short-range nuclear missiles to equal ceilings in conjunction with the global elimination of chemical weapons and the establishment of conventional stability in Europe.

This is a basic principle of the Alliance, that dialogue and co-operation between East and West should not be confined to matters of security and arms control or disarmament. Progress must be achieved in all fields: including political dialogue, in economic co-operation and cultural exchange, in preserving our natural environment and natural resources, in the solution of humanitarian problems, and particularly in realizing human rights.

This principle is a reflection of the experience of our countries and all our citizens: military means alone will not guarantee security and freedom. While we need the necessary military means because freedom cannot be had for nothing, it is important that our citizens support this principle and are convinced that their human dignity is respected most in a free society, that only in such a community can the individual achieve self-fulfilment according to his aptitudes and inclinations, and that only in a free economy it is personal achievement that counts and is rewarded, and that human solidarity and social justice are possible.

The English language has given us the word "commonwealth", a community of free citizens and free nations based on mutual prosperity. That is what we want in Europe. I repeat, we are convinced that an economically and politically united Europe, a strong European community, can render an inestimable contribution to the security of the West as a whole and to world peace and stability. A nucleus of this community is Franco-German co-operation. That co-operation at the end of this century will have overcome many hundreds of years of national egotism and bitter fratricidal wars.

Prime Minister, you referred to your Minister of State who comes from my home country. He comes from a part of the country where for more than 300 years, we had a war in practically every generation; hardly any generation has not seen the villages and the cities destroyed during Franco-

German wars. Today we are living in a period in which the generation of our children would consider it to be absolutely inconceivable that something like this could happen again.

When, three years ago, I met with François Mitterrand, the French President, in Verdun to commemorate the dead of the two wars, what impressed me most was not so much the number of these graves; what impressed me most were the 20,000 or 30,000 school children who had come from France and from Germany and were running about playing with each other. They found it absolutely impossible to imagine that their own grandfathers or great-grandfathers may have been buried in these graves.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: If the French under the Elysée Treaty concluded between Charles De Gaulle and Konrad Adenauer are friends today, then their common policy is not directed against anybody and everybody is invited to join in, but without this nucleus, the core of European development, there will not be a united Europe. We, the French and the Germans, want to be a driving force, an engine, along this path toward a united Europe.

Close relations between a free Europe and North America based on mutual trust remain vital for both sides. I am therefore glad that a regular political dialogue with Canada has been formally agreed in the European community within the framework of European political co-operation on the proposal of the German presidency. This shows the special significance which the Twelve attach to their relations with Canada.

The European community's principal objective now is to complete the single European market by 1992. We aim to create an economic area embracing 320 million consumers, and this is also an important contribution to the development of international trade and commerce. This market offers huge growth opportunities for the European economies and hence for the world economy. It will be and will remain accessible to all. Not only that, it will make the European community an even more capable ally in the fight against protectionism.

The German presidency has energetically pursued this objective of completing the internal domestic market. As early as February, the European Council at its meeting in Brussels set the course, and at the end of this month in Hanover, other important decisions will be taken at the European summit. I am confident that, and I would like to pass on this message to you, when established, the internal market will also offer Canada fresh opportunities to expand her trade relations and her industrial and technological co-operation with Europe.

The U.S.-Canadian agreement on a free trade area, too, has established a new basis for future trade relations on the North American continent. We trust that our friends' expectations here in Canada of increased growth to everyone's advantage will materialize. We trust in the assurance of our Canadian friends that European companies, too, will be able to use the new opportunities for expanding trade. It is our understanding that the free trade agreement will be implemented in accordance with GATT rules. As always, we count on you here in Canada as staunch champions of an open, multilateral trade system.

Another major task of the community which we should also discuss here is the reform of its agricultural policy. I know that criticism of this policy has occasionally been voiced in your country. I think we should discuss this subject here, because particularly among friends, one should speak freely about differences in approach. I am particularly gratified to inform you that in February, the European Council took the necessary fundamental decisions to adjust past aberrations and in particular to limit surplus production.

It must be our objective to limit and to reduce productions in drastic measures. I am against permanent subsidies on principle. Let me add, ladies and gentlemen, when developments have taken a wrong course over 20 years, one cannot remedy the situation overnight. We must now try to attain the objective gradually to reduce the surplus production. Farm units must also have the opportunity in future.

The family-run farm must remain viable in the Europe of the future. However, we respect the decision to take land out of production and reduce farming activity, because this is the only way to ease the strain on the market. Agricultural policy will be one of the subjects on the agenda of the world economic summit in Toronto in a few days' time. The problem of overproduction and of the subsidies race on world markets must be solved.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: In Toronto, we will be discussing the world economic situation, the perspectives for growth without inflationary pressure, and we should also dedicate ourselves to the study of the dangers of global protectionism which have by no means yet been removed. The participants in the summit meeting must together strive to ensure that the GATT Uruguay round will prove successful. This meeting will take place in autumn here in Canada, and it is of the greatest meaning and significance for future international developments in the economic sector, not least in view of the problems confronting the developing countries. We will have to discuss that in Toronto as well, the issues of hunger, poverty and indebtedness.

I am one of those who believe that in the first quarter of the 21st century, the hazards, challenges and risks of the North-South conflict will overshadow the East-West problems. This is not only a question affecting the economic situation. It is also a question of the quality of human policy.

I am making these remarks as a German because as a pupil I lived through the Second World War and I still have memories of what the situation was back in 1945 after the complete breakdown of our country. We were half-starved, and I felt at that time what it means for a country to receive help, help from Canada, help from the United States of America. We have not forgotten that. Since we are now among those countries which are better off in spite of the problems we still have not solved, we consider it important that the strength of a free system should also be shown in acts of solidarity vis-à-vis the poor countries.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Chancellor Kohl: Canada's foreign policy, especially within the framework of the United Nations, reflects in exemplary fashion the awareness that the different worlds on this planet cannot live in isolation from one another. On the contrary:

International solidarity is the dictate of the hour.

Mr. Speaker, not only must Governments and nations combine their efforts and their energies and develop North-South relations in a way that will hold out hope for the future. We must jointly master the challenges facing mankind as a whole:

- in the nuclear age we must prevent any kind of war;
- we must make constructive efforts to provide a new framework for peace;
- we must preserve the natural sources of life for ourselves and our children. We have inherited natural resources from our parents and we cannot allow them to be destroyed now. It is our moral duty to pass on what we have inherited and keep it in good shape;
- we must master new technologies and learn to apply them for the benefit of all states and nations in the service of man.

In view of the enormous dimensions of most recent developments, the risk of having these new technologies manipulated are of the greatest significance and we must ensure recognition of human rights and human dignity throughout the world.

What we need are new strategies which will meet these challenges now and for years to come. Twelve years from now we will live in the year 2000. This century was inaugurated with great hopes and has seen such misery and loss of life. We, on the threshold of a new century, together with all people of goodwill, are trying to live up to our responsibility to future generations. For their environment, for their opportunity at self-fulfilment, and their hope of living in human dignity, the decisions we are taking today will have an influence on their future. Future generations will judge us by whether we today are living up to that responsibility.

In history there are always periods in which far-reaching decisions are made. There is only a relatively short period of time when real decisions will be taken, very often over long distances. Nations have to suffer, to tolerate and accept the results of these decisions. We are living now in an age where such far-reaching decisions are being made. We should be aware of that and we should approach them together. In this context it is good to have exchanges with friends and partners who share the basic values, the basic faith, who share a vision of a peaceful and free world. While we have a common responsibility, it was in this spirit that I came here to meet and talk with friends, and I thank you very much for the friendly welcome you extended to me in your grand country. Thank you very much.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Chancellor, Mrs. Kohl, we are indeed honoured by your address to our Parliament, especially since we had not had the privilege of receiving in these precincts the Leader of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, since your Basic Law of 1949.

[English]

We are proud to welcome to this Chamber an international colleague with such a remarkable political career. You were a militant democrat even before you were of an age to vote. While helping to organize a political Party, you found time to study law, political science, history, and sociology. You must have been able to be in more than one place at a time, and you do not seem to have lost that ability. Were you not equally at home in the Bundesrat and in the Bundestag? Are you not simultaneously Party Leader, coalition leader, and head of Government?

With your devotion to reform, liberalism, and modernism, you are the archetypal citizen of that borderless Germany we have grown to love and admire for its many great artists; Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann; Stockhausen, Fortner and Schnebel; Goethe and Schiller, whose lines have been as familiar to us as Shakespeare's or Racine's; Henrich Heine, that colossus of universal literature, who delighted us when we were students because he took pleasure in extravagance and luxury; Thomas Mann, whose incomparable passages about snow almost entitle us to claim him as one of our own; and Bertolt Brecht, whose plays are so often performed in our theatres.

[Translation]

Your history, Mr. Chancellor, has often been one of sudden change. This was very much in your mind when you selected the subject of your doctorate thesis, namely:

The rebirth of political parties in Germany after World War II.

After 1945 you had to rebuild. Your controversial historian, Oswald Spengler, when he wrote The Decline of the West in 1920, had predicted, despite his pessimism, the important role Germany would have to play in the renewal of Europe, the source of our civilization.

Thanks to politicians of your stature, Europe was rebuilt, and perhaps we should say that a substantial part of the credit should go to your country. Where would the Common Market be without your economic strength? Where would the North Atlantic Treaty Organization be without your determination, and where would the Council of Europe be without your strategic presence?

[English]

Your presence here is clearly an invitation to greater co-operation between our two countries. We already have so much in common: Democratic ideology, economic liberalism, a policy of detente and, I should add, our federal system of Government. While you are geographically in the uncomfortable position between East and West, we in Canada occupy a strategic area between the Soviet Union and the United States. From these observation posts, so to speak, we can more easily understand the fears which weapons engender in us.

Mr. Chancellor, we trust these expressions of friendship will convey to you not only the warm feelings with which our people regard the citizens of the Federal Republic of Germany, but also our respect and admiration for your sense of duty and your contribution to the well-being of your country.

[Translation]

Mr. Chancellor, we express our admiration for the modern country that you personify, and we offer our warmest thanks to you, as a statesman.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Chancellor Kohl, on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons and other honoured guests present, I wish to thank you for your speech and to extend warmest greetings to you and to the citizens of your country. In this often troubled world the friendship between our two nations, the result of our co-operation to ensure peace and security, and our significant bilateral trade is an example of what can be accomplished.

[Translation]

Despite the distances that separate us and despite our cultural differences, our commonality of ideas provides a ready basis for bilateral discussions.

Our citizens have the same concerns about world peace, the humanitarian needs of developing countries, trade and acid rain.

The fact that our two countries work together within the United Nations, NATO and a number of specialized agencies is an important factor in helping to solve these problems, while it also consolidates our friendship.

[English]

Another factor which has helped to develop our friendship is the presence of Canadian servicemen and servicewomen and their families in the Federal Republic of Germany as part of our NATO commitment. I say to you, Chancellor, as a Canadian who served modestly in the Canadian Armed Forces in your country in 1953, your comments today about the children playing together and finding it impossible to believe that their parents or grandparents could have ever been at war were very touching.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Over the years the large number of Canadian personnel who have served in your country have returned to ours with a better awareness of your country's vibrant culture and dynamic economy. In the meantime, your people have become more aware of Canada, not just through that military presence but also because of the growing recognition accorded to its writers, artists, and film makers, and the increasing numbers of contacts with Canadian business representatives.

In short, the cordiality of our relations is not simply the result of diplomatic niceties, but of our commitment to mutual goals and the tolerance with which we treat each other's views. Such friendship between countries is something to be cherished in a world still faced with significant problems.

We have made much progress in recent months in slowing down the arms race and easing international tensions, but there are still many difficulties to resolve and numerous issues to consider. I can say on behalf of the Members of the House, Chancellor, that we have been heartened and impressed with your remarks about the environmental challenges which we as the people on the globe face and must face together.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As parliamentarians we have the responsibility of conveying to world leaders the needs and aspirations of the people we represent. We must also explain to the latter the complexity of the problems and the implications of the proposed solutions.

Parliamentary democracy can be carried out successfully in chambers such as these or in the present temporary premises where the debates of the Bundestag take place pending the reconstruction of your old Assembly Hall, but freedom of speech and sense of duty are the essential features, not a building or ceremonies.

Our shared conception of parliamentary democracy can only underline how much our two countries have in common. We are, therefore, most grateful to you for honouring us with your presence and for your statement of the aspirations of your country and the understanding that you have shown of the aspirations of ours. We have no doubt that the bonds between our two countries, already strong, will be strengthened as a result of your visit among us. Thank you very much and our blessings go with you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL REPORT

QUALITY OF TRANSLATION

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I simply want to raise a point that our former colleague Senator Le Moynes raised angrily before, to the effect that the quality of the English-French translation of our speeches is less than we should consider acceptable.

So I say again what has apparently had no effect to date, namely how indignant I am that a bilingual country cannot find suitable translators.

I protest strongly and I want my protest to be considered. I do not know whom to address, but I must tell you that I am extremely disappointed to see that the efforts of Senator Le Moynes and others, like Senator Guay, in the past have not had any effect so far.

UKRAINE

MILLENNIUM OF CHRISTIANITY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, throughout this summer, and particularly on August 1 of this year, Canadians of Ukrainian descent will be marking the millennium of Christianity in their homeland. I was especially anxious to bring this to the attention of the Senate since my home province of Manitoba is the adopted home of tens of thousands of people of Ukrainian descent.

It is known that the old state of Kievan Rus, now Ukraine, was officially Christian, in August of 988, when Prince Volodymyr, known as Volodymyr the Great, decreed that Christianity was the official religion of the region. Part of Ukrainian history tells us that August 1, 988, was the day upon which the citizens of Kiev were baptized in the Dnieper River. This year, 1988, represents the millennium of Christianity in the Ukraine.

There is some considerable evidence that Christianity existed in that region much earlier. In the writings of Nestor there is a reference to the year 944, when Prince Ihor concluded a treaty with the Byzantines, where persons had taken an oath upon the cross—a clear reference, or perhaps evidence, that as early as 944 there were Christians in that part of the world.

Legend has it that in the first century of the Christian era St. Andrew the Apostle was evangelizing in Kuban, the south-eastern part of contemporary Ukraine. It has also been established that during persecutions of Christians in Rome the fourth Pope, St. Clement, along with several hundreds of his followers, was banished to a region that is believed to be in the south of the present Ukraine. It was during that time and while in exile that missionaries of that group converted large segments of that population to Christianity.

The statehood of Rus was formed in the ninth century, when Kiev was then recognized as the political, cultural and economic centre of eastern Europe. In the year 860 Prince Askold of Kiev made an expedition to Constantinople, where he was somewhat impressed by the faith of the Byzantines, and, consequently, he and his warriors converted to Christianity.

After the assassination of Prince Askold in 882, his successor, Prince Oleh, seized the throne in Kiev, and once again there was pagan rule. What followed was not a pleasant period; it was one of religious persecution and terror. It was not until about the year 915, when Prince Ihor began to rule that state, that there was tolerance, calm and understanding. Notwithstanding the benevolent ruler, the state was divided between what they considered to be Christians and heathens, and both being somewhat formidable forces a form of civil war continued. In 945, history tells us, Ihor was succeeded by his wife, Princess Olga—a very benevolent ruler who not only tolerated Christianity but converted to it.

Princess Olga was succeeded by her son, again a less tolerant ruler. Good news did not come to the Ukrainian people until a grandson of hers ascended the throne, he being Prince Volodymyr, known in Ukrainian history as Volodymyr the Great. This young warrior brought peace to the region and, as I mentioned earlier, restored Christianity as the official faith. Volodymyr himself became a believer in the Christian doctrine and was baptized near Kiev in the year 987. In 988 he proclaimed officially that Christianity would be the state religion of Kievan Rus.

The social as well as the spiritual values of the Ukrainian people through the years have no doubt been influenced considerably by an adherence to the Christian faith. Much of Ukrainian culture displays this clearly.

Times have been difficult in the Ukraine. They were difficult a thousand years ago when Ukrainians were in the process of accepting the faith. They are difficult today in the struggle of the various Ukrainian churches—whether Ukrainian Catholic, Ukrainian Orthodox or the various Ukrainian Protestant denominations—to obtain religious freedom in their home country.

One can easily understand how symbolic it is to mark this great historical event and, in some way perhaps, to open the doors to the hope that those aspects of that culture that are religious will re-emerge and once more be able to flourish.

Honourable senators, I am sure that I speak for all members of this chamber, and perhaps for all Canadians, in extending best wishes to people of Ukrainian descent throughout the world for the very happy celebration of the millennium.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1987

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-131, to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, June 28, 1988.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons which reads as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANADA

Monday, June 20, 1988

ORDERED,—

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendment 6(b) made by the Senate to Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, but disagrees with amendments 1(a), 2, 5, 6(a), 7, 8, 9(a), (b) and (c), 10, and 12(a), (b) and (c), because this House believes they contradict the principles of the Bill for the following reasons:

Amendment 1(a) would imply that the right to counsel of choice would no longer be subject to the requirement that the adjudicator assign counsel at the expense of the Minister where counsel of choice is not reasonably available; arguments over this erroneous implication could be used to delay the refugee determination process.

Amendment 2 would result in the recommencement of every hearing where the claimant indicates a fear of return only after substantive evidence has been heard, providing an opportunity for abuse by those who lack a credible basis for a claim or who would seek to delay or avoid removal by frustrating the "safe" third country mechanism.

Amendment 5 would introduce subjective elements which cannot be easily proven or rejected, thus opening a major loophole in the "safe" third country mechanism.

Amendment 6(a) arises out of Senate amendment 9(a), but is not consistent with the House amendment to Senate amendment 9(a), as set out below.

Amendment 7 would impair the effective elaboration of the "safe" third country list without improving the quality of the protection available to the claimant.

Amendment 8 would extend the scope and nature of Refugee Division hearings, significantly increasing the workload of the Division and thereby delaying decision-making for all claimants.

Amendments 9(b) and (c) arise out of Senate amendment 9(a), but are not consistent with House amendment to Senate amendment 9(a), as set out below.

Amendment 10 would change a fundamental principle that there be one high quality hearing on the merits of the claim by competent decision-makers, which hearing represents a proper balance between fairness and efficiency.

Amendment 12(a) would frustrate the selection of the best possible candidates, including present members, for each division of the new Board.

Amendments 12(b) and (c) are consequential on amendment 12(a), which is not acceptable, and are therefore inappropriate.

And, that this House agrees with the principles set out in amendments 1(b), 3, 4 and 11, but would propose the following amendments:

Amendment 1(b) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 25, on page 7, and substitute the following:

ready and able to proceed within a reasonable period of time, unless the"

Amendment 3 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 26 to 31 on page 14, and substitute the following:

ant's habitual residence,

(i) that has been prescribed as a country that complies with Article 33 of the Convention either universally or with respect to persons of a specified class of persons of which the claimant is a member, and

(ii) whose laws or practices provide that all claimants or claimants of a particular class of persons of which the claimant is a member would be allowed to return to that country, if removed from Canada, or would have the right to have the merits of their claims determined in that country;"

Amendment 4 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 3 to 15, on page 15, and substitute the following:

19(1)(j),

(ii) a person

(A) described in paragraph 19(1)(c), or

(B) who has been convicted in Canada of an offence under any Act of Parliament for which a term of imprisonment of ten years or more may be imposed who the Minister has certified constitutes a danger to the public in Canada, or

(iii) a person described in paragraph 1(e), (f), or (g), or 27(1)(c) or (2)(c) and the Minister is of the opinion that it would be contrary to the public interest to have the claim determined under this Act; or"

Amendment 9(a) be amended to read as follows:

"Add, immediately after line 13, on page 43, the following:

(1.1) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a decision of a visa officer on an application under section 9, 10, 25 or 79 or to any other matter arising thereunder with respect to an application to a visa officer".

Amendment 11 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 25 to 27, on page 55 and substitute the following:

tion, the country's policies and practices with respect to Convention refugee claims and the country's record with respect to human rights;"

and

That Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be further amended in Clause 14

(a) by striking out line 38 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"landing of that person and any member of that person's family who is in Canada at the time of the application, unless the Convention refugee is"

(b) by striking out lines 24 to 26 at page 19 and substituting the following therefor:

"cant and any member of the applicant's family for whom landing is sought if the immigration officer is satisfied that neither the applicant nor any member of the applicant's family who is in Canada is a person"

(c) by adding, immediately after line 8 at page 20, the following:

"(8) for the purposes of this section and section 48.05,

(a) a person is a member of another person's family if the person is

(i) the spouse of that other person, or

(ii) the child of that other person, or

(b) "child", with respect to a person, means

(i) a person of whom that person is the natural parent, whether the person was born within or outside marriage, and who has not been legally adopted by any other person, and

(ii) a person who was legally adopted by that person, but does not include any person who is or has been married;

(c) "spouse", with respect to a person, means a person of the opposite sex to that person who is married to that person by a marriage that is recognized by the law of the country in which it took place, other than a marriage occurring at a time when either person was already married."

(d) by striking out line 17 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"mining eligibility to be grant—"

(e) by striking out line 23 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"for a determination whether the person or any member of that person's family who is in Canada at the time of the application is,"

(f) by striking out line 28 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"shall determine that the applicant and any member of the applicant's family for whom landing is sought is, but"

(g) by striking out line 32 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"member of the applicant's family who is in Canada is a"

(h) by striking out lines 12 to 15 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"(d) the person or any member of the person's family for whom landing is sought was determined not to be eligible to be granted landing for a reason other than the removal order; or

(e) the person and each member of the person's family for whom landing is sought were determined to be,"

(i) by striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) grant landing to the person and each member of the person's family for whom landing is sought, where the person is a person described in paragraph (5)(d) or (e) and the adjudicator is satisfied that, but for the removal order, the person and each member are eligible to be grant—"

and

That the Bill be further amended in Clause 18 by striking out line 37 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"hold office during good behaviour for a term not"

and

That the Bill be further amended in Clause 29 by adding immediately after line 46 at page 55 the following:

"(7) Section 115 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(5) The Minister may establish and appoint the members of a committee to advise the Minister with respect to the prescribing of countries under paragraph (1)(r)."

and

That the Bill be further amended by adding immediately after line 31 at page 56 the following:

"32. Section 123 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"123. The Minister or the Deputy Minister, as the case may be, may authorize such persons employed in the public service of Canada as the Minister or the Deputy Minister deems proper to exercise and perform any of the powers, duties and functions that may or are required to be exercised or performed by the Minister or the Deputy Minister, as the case may be, under this Act or the regulations, other than the powers, duties and functions referred to in paragraphs 19(1)(e) and (2)(a), sub-sections 39(2) and 40(1), subparagraph 48.01(1) (e) (iii) and subsections 82.1(2) and 83(1), and any such power, duty or function performed or exercised by any person so authorized shall be deemed to have been performed or exercised by the Minister or Deputy Minister, as the case may be."

ATTEST

ROBERT MARLEAU

The Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Doody, message placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 28, 1988, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the reason for the motion is as follows: In our discussion on Thursday last it was indicated that the committees could take advantage of the availability of this afternoon, when the Senate rises, and tomorrow afternoon and Thursday afternoon to get on with meetings to handle the government business that is before them.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): "Get on with" or "continue with"?

Senator Doody: "Continue with"—a much better choice of words. I appreciate the help. Some honourable senators on this side, it should be reported, liked my first choice better.

I am pleased to say that the committees have a very full schedule for the rest of this week. I notice that there are 18 meetings scheduled for today, tomorrow and Thursday.

I am told that on Thursday evening there will be a vote in the other place respecting a supply bill, and that that supply bill should be before the Senate on Tuesday of next week. I think we shall manage to get through that on Tuesday.

We shall also have before us on Tuesday next Bill C-131, to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987. I understand that that is not a contentious piece of legislation but deals with access by the disabled. We still have Bill C-77 before a Committee of the Whole. I am told that we will be dealing with that later this afternoon. It is not the intention of that committee to conclude its work this afternoon, because there is other work to be done on Bill C-77, but I hope that we will be able to deal with that on Tuesday of next week.

• (1410)

Beyond Tuesday, we shall see what develops in terms of the sittings and of committee work and we will report on Tuesday where we stand at that time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have only one comment to make with respect to Bill C-77. It is on the order paper and will be the subject of discussion later today. A suggestion has been made that we may be able to complete discussion on the bill next Tuesday. I think we can give consideration to that. Unless some unforeseen difficulty crops up in the meantime, I think it ought to be possible.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

ECONOMIC SUMMIT, 1988

MEASURES TO RELIEVE THIRD WORLD DEBT—AFFECTED COUNTRIES—APPLICATION TO LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have one question for the Leader of the Government. Information is coming out of the Summit in Toronto that the summit leaders have agreed on measures to relieve the Third World debt.

It is not clear whether any of these measures apply to the Latin American debtors like Brazil, Mexico and so on. Can the minister today, or at some later date, give us some detail on which countries will be affected by the proposals and whether the Latin American debtors will be in any way affected by them?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister will be making a statement at 3.30 this afternoon, and I would not scoop him even if I could. I am not in a position at the moment to answer the question the Leader of the Opposition has put, but I shall bring that information into the house tomorrow.

AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would give an undertaking that he will bring in an update on the progress that was made at the Summit respecting the agriculture subsidy issue, which was, we understand, one of the major items before that meeting.

I do not expect him to try to scoop his Prime Minister here today either, but I would ask him to bring in a more complete explanation of what progress was made, because obviously, judging by the reports in the paper, some of the people trying to write those reports do not understand the language, let alone the substance of the reasons why this subsidy situation is in the shape it is in today.

We understand that some offers have been made by countries other than the United States to try to extricate themselves from this enormous subsidy program. It would be useful if we could know the various aspects of those offers and have some detail of who made them.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall table the communiqué from the Summit at the earliest opportunity. If there is any further information with regard to the specific subject the honourable senator has raised, I shall bring it into the house at that time.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that reply.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to give us an indication of the federal government's intentions with respect to a relief program for the farmers and ranchers in western Canada, particularly livestock men, who are having a great deal of difficulty because of the drought.

I want the minister to know that I heard what the Minister of Agriculture had to say about the situation yesterday, and I appreciate the effort that he, his officials and the coordinating committee with the provinces are making. Unfortunately, governments keep saying they are going to do something, but so far they have not announced anything, with the exceptions of the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which have announced some program—or, at least, the expanded financing of a program—for water development.

The point I want to convey to the Leader of the Government, and I hope he will carry it to his colleagues, is that a great number of livestock producers out there have already faced a crisis. Unfortunately, they are doing what I feared they would have to do. Two to three weeks ago they completely ran out of grazing, hay and other feed supplies for their livestock. Therefore, they are having to disperse their herds.

Honourable senators, I am sure the Leader of the Government and the Minister of Agriculture agree that it is unfortunate that these herds have to be dispersed. It is true that some areas have had rain and that not every area is as bad as it was, but I am telling the Leader of the Government that, if he looks at the situation objectively, he will see that over 90 per cent of the affected area in the three western provinces is not only just as bad but is worse this week than it was last week and the week before.

Honourable senators, I do not expect an answer today because I heard what the Minister of Agriculture had to say yesterday. But I would certainly like to impress upon the Leader of the Government—and I request that he carry this to his colleagues—that there are thousands, and there will more thousands with every day that passes, who are getting into a desperate situation in trying to maintain the cattle herds that are left.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, a number of announcements have been made by the federal government and by provincial governments with regard to the drought situation in western Canada. As to what federal-provincial policies or programs would be appropriate to relieve the situation facing livestock producers, that matter is still under consideration by the government.

Senator Olson: As a supplementary question, would the government leader give us an undertaking that he will carry to his colleagues this message from someone who spent last week travelling around that area: This situation is truly desperate. I hope that some movement can be made towards a plan of action instead of some sort of continuing plan that "something might be done" and "we are still studying the matter." Some people are really experiencing desperation—I do not know how else to say it in order to get the Leader of the Government to agree that he will carry that message to the Minister of Agriculture in order to get some action started now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, when we do have an announcement to make, we will couple that announcement with a clear statement of the facts. The honourable senator and I will have an opportunity to compare notes on the matter at that time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope the Leader of the Government is not attempting to dispute the facts as I have laid them before this house—I am sure he is not—but, if this is a matter of interpretation, the interpretation of many thousands of Canadians is that the crisis is now, that it started last week and the week before that—not at some prospective date.

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Based on the precedent of the droughts of 1980 and 1985, it seems to me that the most important program that could be put in place would be a herd maintenance program or a payment per brood cow that could be maintained.

I ask the minister this question: Is the matter of a herd maintenance program of perhaps $60 per brood cow under active consideration? When might we expect an announcement in that regard? I think the producers want from the government not only the payment itself, which is important, but a signal from the government—which this payment would be—that the government believes the livestock industry is extremely important and that the herds should be maintained in spite of the drought. Can we expect an announcement quickly?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government is considering the various options open to it and to its provincial counterparts in this matter. I shall take the honourable senator's question as a representation.

LAPRADE FUND

ORDER PAPER QUESTION NO. 6—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I find it embarrassing to rise on this particular question, and it might even be embarrassing for the Leader of the Government to respond.

On February 3, 1987, I placed a question on the order paper concerning the LaPrade Fund. Since that time, on one or two occasions I raised questions with the Leader of the Government as to why we were not receiving an answer. Those questions are now 16 months old. They seem quite straightforward.

To refresh the minister's memory, there were seven parts to the question that I asked.

(i) when was the Fund established and for what reasons; I do not think that would be too difficult to answer.

(ii) how much money is currently in the Fund; That should not be too difficult either.

(iii) what was the original amount allocated to the Fund and what criteria determined that amount; (iv) have any sums been spent from the Fund and, if so, for which projects and where; (v) is spending for the Fund restricted to a particular area of Canada and, if so, what are the boundaries of the area and how are such boundaries determined; (vi) what are the criteria, if any, for the projects which can become eligible for funding; and (vii) what changes, if any, have been made in the concept and administration of the Fund since September 1984?

I am wondering if there are any deep, dark secrets surrounding the LaPrade Fund; what is the reason that it should take more than 16 months to provide an answer?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sure there are no deep, dark secrets surrounding the fund. I shall have an inquiry go forward with regard to the honourable senator's question.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—STATUS OF CN RAIL SYSTEM—
PROSPECTIVE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on June 14, 1988, I asked the Leader of the Government a question concerning the railroads in Prince Edward Island. The headlines of the Charlottetown The Evening Patriot on Monday, June 20, 1988, read, "Newfoundland loses its railway; 'P.E.I. is next'". In today's Charlottetown Guardian it states:

Federal Trade Minister John Crosbie says P.E.I.'s rail system is 'practically moribund' but it is up to Prince Edward Island to decide on whether to abandon it. Mr. Crosbie was replying to a question on the Island rail system during a St. John's, Nfld. news conference Monday called to announce that the Newfoundland railway is being written out of existence with the signing of an $800-million federal-provincial deal.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me whether or not there is an agreement to be signed between Prince Edward Island and the Government of Canada abandoning all rails in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators. When I was in Prince Edward Island the other day I inquired of a number of leading officials of the government when was the last time they had seen a train. They thought it had been several weeks ago, when it ran into a Canada Packer's truck.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, for a long time in Prince Edward Island the CNR has been attempting to give poor service so that no one will use its service. Let me assure you that it will take three tractor trailers to haul one boxcar of potatoes. Of course, they will be hauled via the road system, and the road system in Prince Edward Island has a poor base. We certainly need rails for freight.

I notice that the rails are being taken up. There must be some kind of agreement signed when the rails are being removed in Prince Edward Island. Why are they removing those rails, and where does the authority come from to remove them?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the situations in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island are different. It is a constitutional question that is being dealt with in Newfoundland. I am not aware that a federal-provincial agreement would be necessary for CN Rail to do what the honourable senator says it is doing. There is another process involved under our law for that.

I was in Prince Edward Island to meet with the premier and ministers concerning a new round of economic and regional development agreements with that province. While we have a highways agreement with Prince Edward Island, the subject that the honourable senator is raising would be outside the scope of an ERDA agreement. It is not, strictly speaking, a matter of regional development, but one of national policy, and I undertook to draw to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Transport the representations made to me by the premier.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that when Prince Edward Island joined Confederation we were promised continuous communication with the mainland and the completion of the railway that Prince Edward Island had started before Confederation. That was not a promise to remove it completely, but to complete the construction of the railroad. Yet we now see it being removed. The Minister for International Trade, Mr. John Crosbie, says that we will lose it; it is next.

If I were negotiating on behalf of Prince Edward Island, I would not accept an $800 million fund for the railroad, because I think we need some funds in perpetuity. The roads in Prince Edward Island will not stand that kind of traffic for any length of time. We can build them for a ten-year period, but ten years down the road they are gone again. We need funds in perpetuity, and some kind of assurance that the railway will be there to take the heavy burden of traffic in Prince Edward Island.

I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to assure me that no agreement will be signed without our first being informed in the Senate, as members of Parliament, so that we shall have an opportunity to appear before some public hearing to defend the rights of the railroad in Prince Edward Island.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to what my honourable friend reports as the present activity of the CNR in Prince Edward Island, there is no agreement of any kind between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island, because there is no need for such an agreement.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am not 100 per cent sure of all the information that the minister has, because Ken MacKenzie, Director of Communications and Transportation for Prince Edward Island, states in this news release—maybe he can assure me that it is wrong—that:

[Senator Bonnell.]

Canadian National is in the process of preparing to abandon all remaining railway lines on the Island.

Is there any truth to that statement?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that was not the question the honourable senator asked. The question the honourable senator asked was whether there was an agreement to that effect between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island. The answer is in the negative.

Senator Bonnell: Are the government and the CNR preparing such an agreement and getting ready to do it? It says here that they are "in the process of preparing to abandon all remaining railway lines on the Island." Are they in the process of preparing to abandon them?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is not in the process of preparing to abandon anything. If the CNR, as he puts it, is in that process, there is, as I understand the act—or used to understand it—a public process that they have to go through in order to effect that kind of abandonment. For greater certainty, I shall ask for a report from the minister who reports to Parliament for Canadian National.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you.

TIBET

DALAI LAMA'S FIVE-POINT PEACE PLAN AND NEW INITIATIVE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask if there are any delayed answers today?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes.

Senator Frith: Does one of them deal with my question about Tibet?

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Frith: I ask because I have a supplementary question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Department of External Affairs advises me that we are concerned about human rights issues in Tibet. The department reminds us that the Prime Minister raised human rights matters in China during his May 1986 visit.

I am informed that, after the riots of last fall, the Canadian Embassy in Peking and officials in Ottawa conveyed to the Chinese authorities Canadian concerns about the human rights situation in Tibet, and we repeated our concerns this spring.

The department reminds me that in 1970, when Canada recognized the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole government of China, it recognized that this government had effective control over Tibetan territory. Thus, as far as Canada is concerned, Tibet is an autonomous region of the People's Republic of China, as established in the Chinese Constitution.

● (1430)

Similarly, while we do regard the Dalai Lama as a senior world religious figure and important Tibetan figure, we do not recognize him as the temporal ruler of a Tibetan state.

Thus endeth my briefing note from the Department of External Affairs. If my learned friend wishes some further information, I will undertake to obtain it for him.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like some more information, not because I consider Senator Murray's reply to my question to be wholly unsatisfactory but because it only establishes the background and brings us up to date on Canada's formal position on China's effective control over Tibet.

My question was about the proposal made by the Dalai Lama for a five-point peace plan. That plan can be responded to in spite of the formal recognition of Tibet as a part of China. If I am not mistaken, the other countries that supported the peace plan also recognized the de facto and de jure control of China over Tibet.

So, will the government leader ask his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, just because of Canada's formal diplomatic position, the government does not feel that it can support the five-point peace plan put forward by the Dalai Lama?

At the same time, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would ask about a subsequent event, amounting to a corollary to the first peace plan, when, on the fifteenth of this month, the Dalai Lama announced a new initiative in efforts to resolve peaceably the worsening situation in Tibet. He did that in an address to the European Parliament in Strasbourg.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries of my colleague and advise the honourable senator.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers and, unless honourable senators request otherwise, I shall ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

CHILD-CARE FACILITIES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 18 last, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding the National Gallery of Canada—Child-Care Facilities.

(The answer follows:)

The new National Gallery of Canada does not have a child-care centre.

It is the philosophy of the National Gallery of Canada to welcome people of all ages, to encourage parents to bring children and expose them to art at the earliest age possible.

The Gallery has taken several initiatives to encourage and accommodate families. The Education Department, for example, has a wide spectrum of programs for varying age levels. Washroom facilities have been equipped with diaper change-tables and, for parents with babies and toddlers, the Gallery is making available, free-of-charge, sturdy strollers for the comfort and enjoyment of its visitors, both big and small.

It is hoped that with these measures, visitors will come to view the National Gallery as a family-oriented facility, one which encourages young and old to participate together in discovering and exploring Canada's artworks.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

COMPLIANCE WITH ACT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 2 last, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding Employment Equity—Compliance with Act.

(The answer follows:)

As of June 14, 1988, 305 employers covered under the Employment Equity Act had delivered their employment equity reports. The current estimate of the number of federally regulated companies who at some point in 1987 had 100 or more employees, and are required, therefore, to submit a report, is 406 (the number of employers required to report may change as further information is obtained). The 305 reports received to date represent over 75 per cent of the total expected. A warning letter was mailed on June 2. On June 17, a demand letter was sent to any employers whose reports are still outstanding according to the records of the Employment Equity Branch, Employment and Immigration Canada. Follow-up phone calls are being carried out by regional and headquarters staff.

There is an enormous effort being made to ensure full compliance with the legislation. This is the first year of employment equity reporting. The reporting format has been designed to provide meaningful data by which to assess the results of mandatory employment equity planning and implementation by crown corporations and federally regulated employers. It is critical that the information contained in employers' reports be correct in order for the reports to be useful to the public, to advocacy groups and to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The Employment Equity Branch is involved not only in receiving reports but also in reviewing, requesting corrections and analysing the information in preparation for the minister's report to Parliament this year.

The Employment Equity Branch has taken a fair but firm approach to employers whose reports have been late, incomplete, or otherwise unacceptable.

Unlike their federal counterparts, who are subject to the full disclosure requirements of the act, the performance of companies under the jurisdiction of the federal contractors program is assessed through on-site compliance reviews.

Currently 1,057 organizations have certified their commitment to the program. While 513 companies have received contracts, making them subject to a compliance review, the selection of organizations for compliance reviews is done at random. In cases where an organization is found not to have complied with all criteria at the time of the initial on-site review, a process of negotiation is initiated, giving a company up to 12 months to complete the mandatory work. Compliance reviews started in September 1987. There are currently 88 reviews in different stages of process.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 7 last, by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding Agriculture—Prince Edward Island Potato Industry—Government Assistance.

(The answer follows:)

The federal government has, in the past, shared the cost of special assistance programs when crop insurance was not available or not adequate and where crop losses were serious, widespread and of a sufficient magnitude to be a financial burden to a province.

Fortunately, crop insurance is available to provide Prince Edward Island farmers with financial protection in the event of serious crop losses.

In 1987-1988, in Prince Edward Island, one potato grower out of three (200 out of 600 commercial growers) chose to purchase crop insurance, and nearly half the acreage (28,500 acres out of 64,000) was insured. Indemnities of $3.8 million were paid to Prince Edward Island potato growers, and close to half this amount was paid to farmers of the western part of the Island who suffered losses due to drought.

Adequate crop insurance protection was available in Prince Edward Island and farmers who were insured were compensated for their losses.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill C-204, An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last week Senator Flynn said that he would not object to interventions on this bill in spite of the fact that it stands in his name. I think he told us that he might be ready to proceed today, but that he might be late. Therefore, honourable senators, I propose to accept Senator Flynn's invitation and make an intervention on Bill C-204.

Honourable senators will remember the legislative history. The bill came to us only recently. It was debated here with only one intervention—I believe it was that of the Honourable Senator Haidasz. It was then referred to the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. It reported the bill without amendment.

Senator Phillips: And without study.

Senator Frith: At the time the committee reported the bill without amendment. Royal Assent had been scheduled for later that day. We on this side agreed to waive notice and let the bill go at third reading in order that it might receive Royal Assent that day. That offer was not accepted by the government.

Subsequently, and although committees are not normally involved at third reading stage, the government said that some questions had been raised about the drafting of the bill and that it needed to look into them and even to refer it back to committee. I made some inquiries about the concerns referred to by the Deputy Leader of the Government and by others regarding the drafting of the bill. I understand that the Law Clerk of the Senate has two reservations in particular. I want to make it clear that I do not object at all to the Law Clerk's raising these points. To do so is within his scope and, indeed, is his duty. I must also say that I cannot finally and completely lay those concerns to rest, but for reasons I hope to make clear I believe we ought to give the bill third reading.

As I understand it, the first concern raised by the Law Clerk of the Senate is the problem of the indemnity of the Crown. He feels that the bill might allow the Crown to be charged and fined in cases where it fails to provide a smoke-free environment to crown employees. The bill was drafted by the Law Clerk of the Commons, who also recognized this problem. He relied on precedents cited in a book by Professor Hogg, entitled Liability of the Crown, suggesting that while the provision might be unusual it was an allowable provision. I would point out that we recently approved Bill C-74, which also applies to the Crown. I suggest that the Crown may have no indemnity from the provisions of the Canada Labour Code, which is the statute most relevant to the employment sections of Bill C-204.

The second concern of the Law Clerk of the Senate is about the adding of tobacco products, as item 5, to the Hazardous Products Act. Subclause 9(1) of Bill C-204, which is rather unusually worded, deals with the addition to that act of tobacco and other products, such as snuff and chewing tobacco, although it does not define them in those exact words. Subclause 9(2) is also rather unusually worded; it deals with the contingent application of Bill C-204, depending upon the passage of Bill C-51. According to my information, subclause 9(1) was drafted by Health and Welfare Canada and later modified by a law clerk in the House, who reinserted the proposed amendment to add item 5 to the Hazardous Products Act. It may well be that this is a drafting error, but it is doubtful that this clause will be in effect under the legislative circumstances I have just described. I think it is arguable that the government might soon introduce a bill to delete clause 9 in any event, because the idea of having a product on the hazardous products list that is controlled by another statute is not attractive.

● (1440)

As I understand it, the next objection is from Via Rail, which is that, if there were only one car on a train, it would have to be a non-smoking train, and Via feels it might lose customers. I can understand the concern, but I point out that Canadian international airlines and bus lines, such as Grey Coach and many others, have gone non-smoking and have told the world that they have experienced no loss of business as a result. I do not believe that Via has any specific or separate studies to back up its claim that it would lose money. This is not to dismiss the concern of Via Rail, but it seems to me that there are enough arguments against their concern that we should not be persuaded to withhold third reading, given the bill's legislative circumstances.

There are some other concerns, apparently, among the officials of Transport Canada and Labour Canada. I have been told that these officials have been approaching legislators and telling them that there are drafting flaws in the bill that need to be corrected before their respective departments will be able to do their jobs. Apparently, this suggestion was first raised here, although these officials, I am informed, were present during the clause-by-clause review of Bill C-204 and, essentially, drafted the clauses of the bill that relate to their departments. It seems to be a matter of second thought.

Honourable senators, it is clear to me that Bill C-204 has some legal warts that might mar the dermatology of its legal elegance.

Senator MacDonald: I wish I had said that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if there were any copyright on remarks made in this chamber, which I do not think there is, I would certainly license Senator MacDonald if, at any future date, he wanted to use that phrase.

In spite of these concerns, I believe that we should give this bill third reading soon; in fact, I suggest that we give it third reading next week and have no further adjournments. I say that because of the legislative context I have referred to. This is a private bill; if it does not receive third reading, or it is sent back to the House of Commons with any amendments, the chance of its finding its way to the top of the private members' list in the House of Commons is very remote. In effect, amending this bill kills it.

That is not so with regard to Bill C-51, which may require a technical change. That is a government bill, and when it is returned it will not have to find its way to the top of the list of bills to be dealt with by the laws of chance and time that apply to private members' bills.

To restate my proposition, honourable senators, I believe that the problems, quite properly raised by the Law Clerk of the Senate, and by the Deputy Leader of the Government because they were brought to his attention—and I think it was quite correct of him to raise them before the Senate—are not of sufficient importance for us to send this bill back or to delay third reading any longer, when we realize that doing so may very well kill the bill. I believe the bill has a great deal of support both here and in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Flynn.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, although we are going to support that motion, I want to underline that I have discussed the points I raised here with my colleagues and we wish to have no further adjournment of the debate at third reading. We want the question put next week.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I cannot make any commitment one way or the other. I take notice of what Senator Frith has said, but, nevertheless, this order did stand in the name of Senator Flynn and I think it is only fair that it be adjourned in his name.

Senator Frith: I did not expect to receive a commitment. I was simply advising the deputy leader of our position.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the second reading of the Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Patent Act.—(Honourable Senator Barootes).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will remember that last Thursday I advised the Senate that Senator Barootes called to inform me that he wanted this matter put over for another week. I discussed the matter with him and he agreed, admittedly reluctantly, that he would raise his objections before the committee.

Therefore, I repeat that our position is that this bill should receive second reading and be referred to committee where a number of these differences about statistics and principle can be thrashed out. We therefore ask for adoption of the motion for second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

EMERGENCIES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-77. This afternoon we have a witness who wishes to appear before the committee. I understand that the witness is available; so we shall await her entry into the chamber.

Pursuant to the Order adopted by the Senate on June 8, 1988, Ms. Ann Sunahara, Legal Counsel, National Association of Japanese Canadians, was escorted to a seat in the chamber.

The Chairman: Our witness this afternoon, honourable senators, is Ann Sunahara, barrister and solicitor, appearing on behalf of the National Association of Japanese Canadians. A copy of a letter from Ms. Sunahara has been distributed to all members of the committee.

I welcome you to our committee, Ms. Sunahara. Our normal practice is to have an introductory statement by the witness of some 15 minutes and then to proceed with questioning by honourable senators. If that is agreeable, we are ready to proceed.

• (1450)

Ms. M. Ann Sunahara, Legal Counsel, National Association of Japanese Canadians: Thank you, sir. I thank the Senate for giving the National Association of Japanese Canadians an opportunity to offer comments on Bill C-77.

[Senator Frith.]

The National Association of Japanese Canadians, as you probably know, is the democratically elected representative of Canada's 56,000 Japanese Canadians. Japanese Canadians have a very special concern about emergency measures legislation, being among the best-documented victims of the War Measures Act. The National Association of Japanese Canadians regards Bill C-77 as part of an attempt to redress what happened during the Second World War. Reform of the War Measures Act is something that the National Association has been seeking since 1945.

The National Association of Japanese Canadians is determined that any reform of the War Measures Act must prevent a recurrence of what happened to Japanese Canadians. As you know, 20,881 men, women and children were uprooted from their homes in February of 1942, processed through detention camps in British Columbia and the sugar beet fields of Alberta and Manitoba, and forced to choose between moving east of the Rocky Mountains or being deported to Japan. Their property was sold and the proceeds were used to pay for their incarceration. They were not permitted to return to their homes on the Pacific coast, or to enter British Columbia, until 1949. Even those Japanese Canadians who were finally able to get into the armed forces were not permitted to return to B.C. before 1949.

Consequently, I was asked by the National Association of Japanese Canadians to prepare an analysis of the Emergencies Act. We presented a 61-page brief to the legislative committee on Bill C-77, a copy of which will be made available to any senator who wishes it.

Many of our concerns in that brief were met by the other House in its amendments. Our principal concerns were with the definitions of the types of emergencies and with Parliament's ability to control the executive when exercising emergency powers and to revoke inappropriate orders in council.

Two of our concerns were not met. Our first concern is with secret orders, which we feel are both unnecessary and unwise and are already provided for in the CSIS Act. Our second concern—and what brings me here today—is with the Charter override which we see within this act.

You have received through the material I submitted my legal opinion of the minister's reasons as to why there is no Charter override. In brief, using the War Measures Act cases, our argument is that Parliament has the power to delegate to a subordinate body anything within its powers. It did so in the War Measures Act, delegating what has been termed by the courts to be "plenary powers of legislation". In other words, the cabinet, by order in council, could legislate as if it were Parliament, using any of the federal government's powers to legislate.

Since the Second World War, of course, and since October 1970, when the War Measures Act was last used, Parliament has gained one more power, the power to pass orders or laws that override certain Charter rights, the fundamental freedoms, equality and legal rights. That means that Parliament, of course, can now pass laws that take away the right to trial, that take away the right against unreasonable search and seizure, that take away the presumption of innocence until proven guilty, that take away the right of assembly, the right of free speech and freedom of the press. These are serious and necessary rights in our society.

● (1500)

It is our submission that the powers delegated to the executive under the proposed Emergencies Act are as broad as they were under the War Measures Act. Since Parliament is not precluded from delegating its powers under section 33 of the Charter, it is our position that, by that broad delegation of powers in the proposed Emergencies Act, Parliament has delegated to the cabinet, or will if the bill is passed, the power to pass orders in council having the effect of statutes that can override Charter rights. The mechanism is to put the correct phrasing within the order in council in order to make it specific enough, define which rights, and so forth, as required by section 33. But, in the absence of an express provision withdrawing that right from the executive under the proposed Emergencies Act, the executive can pass orders in council overriding Charter rights.

The law in the matter is set out, in my opinion, with case references and in a way I hope is not too legalistic. It is because of this danger that the National Association of Japanese Canadians is requesting this house to amend clause 4 of the act to include a subparagraph (c) which would specifically withdraw from the executive the power to invoke section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any order in council it makes under the proposed act.

The best solution, of course, would be a Charter amendment, but since that is not immediately available we ask that this house protect the rights of Canadians and define the limits of the powers of the executive under the proposed Emergencies Act to restrict them from using a Charter override.

Those are my submissions.

The Chairman: Thank you, Ms. Sunahara. The first name I have on my list is that of Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You mentioned that the bill now provides for a good deal of parliamentary control over the activities of the Governor in Council. Evidently you are familiar with the experience of Japanese Canadians during the 1939 to 1945 period. Do you think that the provision of similar controls in the War Measures Act would have been helpful to Japanese Canadians at that time? I am not, of course, talking about the provision of clause 4(b); I am talking about what we may call parliamentary surveillance.

Do you believe that in the political mood of those times that kind of parliamentary surveillance would have been of any use at all in the protection of Japanese Canadians?

Ms. Sunahara: I think the best answer to that is found in the attempt to deport Japanese Canadians in 1945. In October of 1945 Parliament refused to allow the right to deport Canadians to be included in the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act of 1945. The government withdrew the clause in that bill that would have given them that power, saying that Parliament would be consulted if there were to be any move to deport anyone from Canada. In a House depleted by the Christmas recess three weeks later, the government tabled an order in council, under the War Measures Act, deporting 10,000 Japanese Canadians, because at that point Parliament had no control over any order in council. That order in council was automatically continued by the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act of 1945. I think that is the best example. The Canadian Parliament had spoken and had told the government not to deport Canadians, and the executive turned around and tried to do exactly that.

I may add that there was a happy ending to that; two years later, after massive public objection, the deportation of Japanese Canadians was halted and the order withdrawn.

Another example was the order in council selling Japanese Canadian property. That was put before the House of Commons on the advice that it was to enable the custodian of seized property to dispose of certain depreciating properties, and, the implication was, with the consent of the owners. Everything was ordered to be sold two months later. Everything was ordered sold: real property, personal property, everything! The House of Commons and the Senate could do nothing about it.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): What was the date of that transaction?

Ms. Sunahara: The order in council was placed before the House in April of 1943, and it was at the end of May that the brochures were printed and distributed to sell off all Japanese Canadian property.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I ask you that question because much has been made of the parliamentary controls in this bill, and I do not want to attempt to diminish the importance of those controls, but my reading of the Second World War experience is that in the political environment of 1940, 1941 and 1942 parliamentary control would have meant virtually nothing, that the government of the day was being harassed constantly to do more to provide greater national security rather than protect the civil liberties of Canadians and others.

Ms. Sunahara: We are aware that public opinion, as reflected in the political sphere, is not the most thorough way to protect Canadian civil liberties. The National Association of Japanese Canadians has greater confidence in Parliament as a whole than it has in an executive, which may have certain political objectives it wishes to accomplish on its own.

Again, their own experience has been that a large number of members of the House of Commons and the Senate fought on behalf of Japanese Canadians. I believe Senator Croll, in fact, took part in much of the opposition to what was done to Japanese Canadians. Having a public forum in which the subject could at least be discussed is also vital. We all know that the cabinet operates in secrecy and that what it does remains secret for 20 years, which is the other problem.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am intrigued by the fact that you raised an objection to secret orders, but evidently you do not want to take time on that today. You are satisfied that the matter of secret orders has been reasonably well covered?

Ms. Sunahara: We still stand on our position that the power for secret orders is unnecessary since any provision for secret orders has already been made by Parliament in the CSIS Act.

Our concern today, and our primary concern with this bill, is the potential Charter override. Because there are secret orders, we feel that is potentially draconian.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let us talk about what has been called Charter override. What the Charter says is that Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an act of Parliament, or of the legislature as the case may be, that the act, or a provision thereof, shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of the Charter.

• (1510)

You are fearful that the words in clause 40(1) of Bill C-77 may constitute a delegation to the Governor in Council of Parliament's authority to say that a right in the Charter shall be set aside by an order in council or a regulation. Is that your argument?

Ms. Sunahara: The version of the bill I have—if you are referring to the clause which gives the Governor in Council the power to make orders and regulations in a war emergency—has been renumbered since I wrote my brief.

Our concern is that that clause is essentially the same as the section of the War Measures Act which has been held in law to confer plenary powers of legislation upon the cabinet.

Senator Frith: Can you give us that citation so it is on the record? Do you mind, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): It would be helpful to have the citation.

Ms. Sunahara: The reference is the Chemicals Reference, a 1943 case of the Supreme Court of Canada. It is (1943), Supreme Court Reports 1, and the statement will be found at page 17 of Chief Justice Duff's judgment.

Senator Frith: And it never went further?

Ms. Sunahara: No, it did not.

Senator Frith: At that time there were appeals to the Privy Council.

Ms. Sunahara: There were appeals to the Privy Council, but—

Senator Frith: But it was not done.

Ms. Sunahara: —it was not proceeded with so this is the binding law in Canada.

[Ms. Sunahara.]

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): When you say it is plenary power, you mean that Parliament is delegating 100 per cent of its own legal competence.

Ms. Sunahara: But keeping back—as they established in the Re Gray case during the First World War—the power to revoke the delegation; otherwise it becomes an abdication.

I might add that, while the courts found in the War Measures Act that power to revoke the delegation, it was not a practical power in that the only way it could be done was by bringing down the government.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But we are talking about the law. You are saying that you believe that the War Measures Act and this bill, if enacted, both delegate plenary power to the Governor in Council. By that you mean that, aside from Parliament's ability to repeal or amend the act in question itself, the Governor in Council could do anything that Parliament itself could do.

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Except for the specified exceptions which appeared in clause 4.

Ms. Sunahara: Yes. The full quotation from the Chemicals Reference is "... plenary powers of legislation as large as and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself."

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): I will use a specific example which may be helpful. Under your interpretation, could the Governor in Council have used the War Measures Act to introduce taxation? New taxes?

Ms. Sunahara: Yes, or they could have amended any existing tax act by order in council.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): How do you get around the provision in the Charter that says that the Parliament may use the "notwithstanding" clause only by an express declaration?

• (1520)

Ms. Sunahara: That can be done through the wording of the order in council. If you wanted, for instance, to pass an order in council which said that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police could arrest anyone deemed to be a threat to the national security of Canada and could hold them without trial, the order in council would have to be phrased as saying, basically, "Notwithstanding the right to trial extended in paragraph 11.(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Minister of Justice may deem persons to be a threat", et cetera.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That was not quite my question. I am questioning your view that this is as plenary a delegation as that made by the War Measures Act. I am questioning it because of the provisions of section 33 of the Charter. That section gives Parliament the "notwithstanding" power, but it can exercise the "notwithstanding" power only by express declaration of Parliament.

Parliament has not made an express declaration in Bill C-77. Therefore, I would be inclined to argue that Parliament has not delegated to the Governor in Council the "notwithstanding" power.

Ms. Sunahara: If Parliament has delegated plenary powers of legislation to the executive, then Parliament is basically saying to the executive, "Act in our place and stead to do whatever we can do." Therefore, when an order in council is equivalent to an act of Parliament, the executive, acting in Parliament's place and stead, is passing an act which would include the "notwithstanding" clause.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes, I understand your argument. My difficulty with it is this: The Charter has intervened since the time of the enactment of the War Measures Act. I question your assumption that the delegation in Bill C-77 is as extensive as was the delegation in the War Measures Act. It seems to me that Parliament can exercise the "notwithstanding" provision only by parliamentary express declaration.

Ms. Sunahara: The whole question in law is whether, if Parliament delegates powers to a body and that body, acting in Parliament's place, wishes to make an express declaration, it can do so. That point is not yet settled in law. Our first request to the minister was to refer this question to the Supreme Court of Canada. Let us get this matter settled.

I have an opinion—which is concurred in, I might add, by the Dean of the Law School of the University of Alberta—that, when granting plenary powers, they include all of Parliament's powers. These powers may have been defined in 1942 in terms of sections 91, 94 and 95 of the British North America Act, but today they are defined in sections 91, 92 and 94, and the intervening Constitution Acts, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Therefore, when plenary powers are delegated now, the delegation is of powers greater than it was possible to delegate in 1939.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I think I have exhausted this line of questioning. I am sure that other senators will want to put questions to this witness.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Stewart. Next on my list is Senator Marsden, followed by Senator Frith.

Senator Marsden: I should first like to say to the witness how much we appreciate her coming and how valuable it is to have before us someone so familiar with this piece of legislation. I wonder if she would be prepared to go beyond the clauses with which she is particularly concerned to tell us whether she has looked at this piece of legislation from one or two other points of view. If she has not, I quite understand her not wanting to respond.

Have you, Ms. Sunahara, looked at what is required under the various types of emergencies from the point of view of privacy and the privacy legislation we now have in this country?

Ms. Sunahara: I looked at the original bill from an historical point of view. I am an historian as well as a lawyer, having written a history of Japanese Canadians. I looked at it from the practical point of view; in other words, I considered what was done to Japanese Canadians at the time of the Second World War and asked whether we could do it again.

Historically, the only powers governments have ever needed in times of emergency—powers that have been properly used—were economic ones, the powers, basically, to ration, to get war production moving, to control goods and services, et cetera. The powers to infringe upon civil liberties have been more abused than used—and the Ukrainians will endorse my statement to that effect.

With regard to privacy, if we can allow search and seizure without reasonable grounds, we open the door completely to wire taps. Wire taps eliminate privacy—they introduce Nineteen Eighty-Four. In that regard, the other problem, the reverse side of the Privacy Act, is the new Freedom of Information Act, which freezes all documents referred to by cabinet in a time of emergency for 20 years, regardless of their significance. A judge cannot even look at them to determine whether there is a national security element to them. Quite frankly, when I went into the archives in the course of my research, I found that some of the "secret" information on Japanese Canadians was little better than laundry lists, which I would have thought should have been made public years ago.

Senator Marsden: You seem to be focusing heavily upon what happens in time of war, but could I ask you to look at some of the less dramatic events in this regard? The public welfare emergency is one that preoccupies me, and, if I am correct, search and seizure is not really an element of it. Property can be confiscated and disposed of; people can be evacuated and detained, and their travel can be regulated or prohibited, but that is not quite the same sweep as that to which you refer.

Ms. Sunahara: No, but my primary objection to the public welfare emergency is that it tramples upon provincial rights. Of course, being an Albertan, I am quite sensitive to provincial rights. Provincial agencies are in place to handle natural disasters. There has been no evidence in Canada that people have ever refused to give their services. True, no formal arrangement has been made to compensate them for their services, but, as a lawyer, I would reply that there is always a suit in quantum meruit.

It seems to me to be a lot of power to deal with something that is so extremely rare. When I was analyzing all of this I was trying to think of an example of public welfare emergency. Short of the hypothetical tidal wave hitting Vancouver—

Senator Marsden: Let me propose one which concerns me at the moment. As you are aware, this legislation covers diseases in human beings, animals and plants. One of the potential threats to civil liberties in this country is any law that may be made concerning people who have tested HIV positive, or people who have AIDS, where privacy is already a matter that has been raised in certain provincial jurisdictions. It is specifically with that example in mind that I ask you about privacy in relation to public welfare emergencies.

Ms. Sunahara: Both British Columbia and Alberta now have in place acts that require persons who have been diagnosed to be AIDS patients to be reported and that permit a medical officer to go to a court and obtain an order to confine them. This is another example of something that, technically, I suppose, is interprovincial, in that we have the freedom to move from province to province in Canada. I might add that any attempt to restrict that movement would be contrary to section 6 of the Charter, which cannot be withstood.

Quite frankly, to put a federal veneer on top of all this is, in my view, a redundancy. Public health is a provincial matter; the provinces all have public health departments. If we added another layer of bureaucracy to this, not only would it be more expensive but someone could conceivably be cleared by a provincial public health officer only to find himself in trouble with a federal public health officer. If anything is going to bring justice into disrepute, that will do it.

● (1530)

Senator Marsden: So your major argument on this section is that it is redundant and therefore unnecessary?

Ms. Sunahara: It is a replication of provincial powers. I would think it could be accomplished at much less cost by agreements and cooperation between the provinces.

In my original draft I suggested that the federal government could perhaps serve well to set up some sort of data bank of experts for flying in medical doctors who specialize in trauma, if a tidal wave does hit Vancouver. To create an entire bureaucracy over and above the provincial bureaucracy seems unnecessary.

Senator Frith: I want to ensure that you focused on section 53 of the Constitution Act when you quickly said that you felt the delegation to the executive could include the power to tax. That section reads:

Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Whereas the other powers that Parliament has are powers of Parliament. In section 91, for example, it says that Parliament may make laws in certain classes of subjects.

I am not arguing with your conclusion. You answered it rather quickly, and I thought that Senator Stewart's question meant to focus your attention on the power to tax as a bit different from general legislative power.

Ms. Sunahara: If Senator Stewart was making a reference to section 53, I did not catch that. As I understand it, that provision in section 53 is to ensure that money bills originate in the elected House. Since the executive is composed almost entirely of persons from the elected House, the tabling of an order in council in that House, I would say off the top of my head, would satisfy section 53.

Parliament, under this Emergencies Act, does have the power to revoke orders in council. As another senator has pointed out, that is not necessarily a reliable way to protect civil liberties.

The National Association of Japanese Canadians would like to see this act make it possible for a government to exercise the powers it needs to, but difficult for it to misuse them. That is basically the fine line that we have been trying to draw in our submission.

Senator Frith: I think that is a very important line.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to have a few more items put on the record so that someone wanting to get Ms. Sunahara's point of view can get at least the essence of it all in one place.

Let us deal with section 33 and ensure we understand what section 33 can override. It is substantial, but it may be worthwhile getting that on the record. Your position is that because of section 33 and the Chemicals Reference case, Parliament can delegate to the executive the powers it has to override the Charter, as found in subsection 33(1).

Those powers relate to the following sections of the Charter. Section 2 deals with fundamental freedoms: freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, freedom of peaceful assembly, and freedom of association. All of those, you say, on your interpretation, could be overridden by the executive; is that correct?

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Frith: Then let us deal with sections 7 to 15 of the Charter. Section 7 deals with life and liberty. Section 8 deals with search and seizure. Section 9 deals with detention or imprisonment. Section 10 says that everyone has the right on arrest or detention to certain information. Section 11 deals with proceedings in criminal and penal matters. That section contains subsections from (a) through to (i), inclusive. Section 12 says that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment. Section 13 deals with witnesses' rights against self-incrimination. Section 14 deals with the right to have an interpreter. Section 15 deals with equality rights before and under the law, and equal protection of benefits of the law.

You say that each of those could be overridden by the cabinet or an order in council by reason of the delegation in this act—Bill C-77—of Parliament's power under section 33; is that right?

Ms. Sunahara: That is right. The other authority is the case of Re Gray in 1919, a case of the Supreme Court of Canada that held that Parliament did have the ability to delegate its law-making powers to a subordinate agency and had done so in the War Measures Act, notwithstanding the fact that the delegation was very broad.

Senator Frith: I understand that this opinion is supported by the Dean of the Law School in Alberta.

Ms. Sunahara: Yes, Timothy J. Christian.

Senator Frith: The opinion is that those cases stating that the delegation granted plenary parliamentary powers would apply today as well as they did then, although at that time there were no limits on legislative power, except the limits within the distribution of powers.

Just to dramatize the question a little more, prior to the Charter we were all taught in law school that Parliament was supreme. The classic example was that, so long as it was within its powers under section 91, it could make a man a woman or a woman a man. You probably remember hearing that.

Ms. Sunahara: Or a person of both.

Senator Frith: You say that, notwithstanding those unfettered powers which were in existence at the time of both the Gray case and the Chemicals Reference case, there is nothing in the reasoning to change their application to present day, when Parliament's rights are circumscribed by the Charter.

Ms. Sunahara: When they met in the kitchen to draft section 33, they did not think about limiting the delegating powers. Since the power to delegate Charter powers has not been put in there, there is nothing to prevent Parliament from delegating that power, unless some argument in law can be made. In fact, it would be stimulating to attempt it. Until the Supreme Court of Canada makes a ruling, there is absolutely nothing to stop the delegation of section 33 powers. Then the other question is: Has it been sufficient here?

The bottom line is that it is an unsettled point of law. Until it is settled, we do not know the limits of the powers that are being given under this act.

Senator Frith: Or any limitations by reason of the existence of the Charter.

Ms. Sunahara: Precisely.

Senator Frith: In effect, you are saying that the argument could be made that the legislative context is different, but you yourself think that the dicta in the Chemicals Reference and Gray cases should apply now just as strongly as they did then in terms of the grant of plenary power.

Ms. Sunahara: Basically, yes. Let me put it this way: If I had to argue that the Charter must be construed differently from the rest of the Constitution, which is basically what you have to argue, and that it must be construed as no delegation, where the rest of the Constitution allows delegation, I would expect to lose that argument, although there are some jurisprudential arguments that can be made. The matter remains unsettled, and we are asking, in view of the fact that it is so unsettled, that this house amend the act to make the minister's intention clear, that there is no intention to give a Charter override in this act.

● (1540)

Senator Frith: That brings me to my last point. Your suggestion for an amendment, on page 2 of the memorandum that you distributed, means that an additional subclause should be added to clause 4 so that it would read:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed or applied so as to confer on the Governor in Council the power to make orders or regulations . . .

(c) invoking section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the powers thereunder to declare . . .

The minister, according to a letter that is to be attached to your document, said, "there is very little basis for concern." I take it he did not say that there is no basis for concern.

Ms. Sunahara: The position of the National Association of Japanese Canadians is that "very little basis" is too much.

Senator Frith: I hear you.

If he simply says, "There is very little basis for concern," I take it he is saying that he does not think that section 33 can be invoked by the Governor in Council. Did he say that?

Ms. Sunahara: The best way is to look at the last sentence, where he states:

However, there is not the faintest suggestion in either that Parliament's power under section 33 of the Charter may be exercised by the Governor in Council.

In essence, what he is saying is that in their view section 33 cannot be exercised in this way. That is just a legal opinion.

Senator Frith: I understand. I wanted to get his legal position. You do not need to argue it for the moment. His position is that he does not think the Governor in Council can invoke section 33.

If that is so, all you do is make clear his opinion with paragraph (c).

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Frith: His opinion is that it cannot be invoked, and your paragraph (c), in effect, agrees.

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Frith: In effect, you are making clear that what he says is already the case.

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Frith: Did you put your actual wording of paragraph (c) to him in that context and say, "Well, if the Governor in Council cannot invoke section 33, then why not say so?"

Ms. Sunahara: That is basically our position.

Senator Frith: Did you put this exact amendment to him?

Ms. Sunahara: We put the concept to him, thinking that he would prefer to draft it in his own words. I did put a suggestion to the legislative committee of a simpler version than this, but I drafted this one because I thought of a few other things—for example, that we do not want an order in council that amends the Criminal Code to allow search and seizure without reasonable grounds. My original draft, which I put to the minister, has been modified in this version put before this house.

Senator Frith: Are you prepared to say that on the basis of your experience up to now, if we amended this bill by adding your suggested paragraph (c) to clause 4, we would simply be making clear what the minister already says is so?

Ms. Sunahara: Yes.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. I do not have any other hands up at the moment on the first round. Senator

Stewart, if you wish, you may begin to question on the second round.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The bill makes frequent use of the expression "on reasonable grounds". For example, in clause 38.(1) it states:

When the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, that a war emergency exists . . . the Governor in Council . . . may . . . so declare.

In the clause that we have been discussing chiefly, clause 40, subclause (1), it states:

While a declaration of a war emergency is in effect, the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

What is the functional effect of the words "on reasonable grounds"? What difference does their inclusion in those two examples make?

Ms. Sunahara: It is my understanding that that amendment was done to permit the courts to review the grounds upon which the order is made. There is still some question, however, as to whether someone challenging must prove that the grounds were unreasonable or whether the onus is on the government to prove that they were reasonable. That distinction is important. For example, in the Japanese-Canadians case we did not get the documents to prove the unreasonableness of what was done to Japanese Canadians until 1976—30 years after the event.

The evidence that would be needed to prove reasonableness or unreasonableness can only come from the government. This is another reason why we wanted this amendment put in about the Charter override. You can imagine the disability of someone who has been subjected to an order removing his legal rights having to turn around and prove that the basis for subjecting him to that order was itself unreasonable. I can think of a number of examples off the top of my head.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You are concentrating on the question of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the grounds; I wanted to focus on the verb "believes".

Ms. Sunahara: Yes; okay.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Does this mean that the court has to share the belief of the Governor in Council, or does it mean simply that the court will find that there are, or are not, grounds to believe, and that the Governor in Council can form its own belief, although the court might not share that belief?

Ms. Sunahara: The latter is the case. In law, "believes" is usually construed as meaning "believes in good faith." In order to rebut a belief you would have to establish that the Governor in Council was not acting in good faith, which we all know would be absolutely impossible to do.

[The Chairman.]

The courts also do not question, and traditionally have not questioned, the beliefs of the government. It is not the case that the court has to come to the same conclusion. In fact, there are several cases like the ones referred to. I go into this in my submission to the legislative committee. The courts simply do not question the grounds on which a government forms its opinion; they take the view that they have the best evidence and that they are reasonable men. Therefore, unless bad faith is shown, the Governor in Council must have believed it in order to have passed the order in council.

● (1550)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So what you are saying is that the inclusion of the words "on reasonable grounds" throughout the clauses of this bill really does not mean very much. You could get into court and the Governor in Council would send someone to appear there and say that the Governor in Council did, indeed, believe.

Ms. Sunahara: It would also enable you perhaps to buy time in order to publicize the situation by arguing that, in your particular case, the grounds were not reasonable. For instance, if the order were to outlaw a particular group, it would give you the opportunity to argue that you were not a member of the group and therefore, as it applied to you, it was not a reasonable order. That is the kind of argument to which I refer.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: As there are no other senators who wish to question you, I should like to thank you very much, Ms. Sunahara, for giving us the benefit of your study of and knowledge in this particular field. It has been very helpful to us.

Ms. Sunahara: Thank you, sir.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, during the course of the questioning there was reference to a fact sheet prepared by Emergency Preparedness Canada on the specific questions regarding the recommendations of the Japanese-Canadians. Is it your wish that that fact sheet be distributed to honourable senators at this time?

Senator Doody: Perhaps we could append it to the committee proceedings.

The Chairman: If that is your wish, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Provided that we are appending the evidence of Ms. Sunahara, we can append the fact sheet as well.

Senator Doody: What Ms. Sunahara said will appear in Hansard.

Senator Frith: Yes, but she did not read through all of her written submission.

Senator Doody: I see.

Senator Frith: Therefore, I do not see why we should not append both submissions.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we append both the letter, which was distributed to honourable senators from Ms. Sunahara, and the fact sheet from Emergency Preparedness Canada?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it your wish to proceed further or is it your wish to rise and report progress?

Senator Frith: Is there no one here to speak in support of the memorandum from the department?

The Chairman: No. It was delivered to the back door of the Senate and the request was made that it be distributed.

Senator Frith: Is it signed by someone?

The Chairman: No, but it is written on departmental letterhead.

Senator Frith: Which department are you referring to, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: It is on the letterhead of Emergency Preparedness Canada.

Senator Frith: We might want to have a look at it and call someone from the department. However, in the meantime, we will append it.

(For text of documents, see appendix, p. 3724.)

Senator Doody: In the meantime, perhaps the committee could rise and report progress.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee adjourn, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition) moved that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented in the Senate on June 16, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the fifty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be now adopted.

Motion agreed to and reported adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 28, 1988, at 2 p.m.

Re: The Emergencies Act and Charter Override

I am a legal counsel to the National Association of Japanese Canadians with respect to their submission to the Legislative Committee on Bill C-77 and their ongoing concerns with the new Emergencies Act.

As you may be aware, part of our submission was concerned with the possibility that that Act might empower the Governor in Council to use Parliament's powers to override Charter rights. In response to our concerns the Minister responsible, Perrin Beatty, assured us that he had a legal opinion to the contrary on which he was relying.

The Minister has now provided us with a summary of that opinion. We are forced to conclude that it is seriously flawed and that there remains the distinct possibility that fundamental freedoms and legal rights could be overridden by Order in Council in time of emergency.

The National Association of Japanese Canadians finds this possibility unacceptable and has requested the Minister to refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada for a definitive ruling.

The better solution, of course, is to amend Bill C-77 to expressly remove all possibility that a future executive could make Orders in Council that override Charter Rights. That objective can be accomplished by amending section 4 to read (amendment underlined):

"4. Nothing in this Act shall be construed or applied so as to confer on the Governor in Council the power to make orders or regulations

(a) altering the provisions of this Act; or,

(b) providing for the detention, imprisonment or internment of Canadian citizens or permanent residents as defined in the Immigration Act, 1976 on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex or mental or physical disability; or,

(c) invoking section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the powers thereunder to declare in any order or regulation that the order or regulation, or any other order or regulation or Act of Parliament, or any provision thereof, shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of the Charter."

The Minister responsible has stated that no Charter override is intended. It is in the interest of all Canadians that that intention be set out in the Act so that it binds future governments and the courts. Only with an amendment like that above will Canadians know for certain the extent of the legislative powers of the executive in time of national emergency.

Accordingly, the National Association of Japanese Canadians seeks your support for its requests that the Senate amend Bill C-77 to expressly exclude any possibility of the exercise of Parliament's Charter override powers by the executive.

For your information please find enclosed copies of:

(a) pages 32 through 35 of our submission to the Legislative Committee on Bill C-77 which outline our concerns;

(b) the initial request of the President of the NAJC for a reference of this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada;

(c) a letter from the Minister Responsible for Emergency Preparedness outlining his reasons for believing that "there is very little basis for concern" about a Charter override in the Emergencies Act;

(d) the response of the President of the National Association of Japanese Canadians; and,

(e) a copy of my opinion referred to in the President's response.

The Minister's reasons appear to rest on the argument that Parliament cannot delegate its constitutional powers.

This argument is directly contrary to the rulings in cases dealing with Orders in Council made under the War Measures Act, cases which determined that Parliament could delegate legislative powers to the executive and that, in the War Measures Act, Parliament had in fact delegated "plenary powers of legislation as large as and of the same nature as those of Parliament": Chemicals Reference, [1943] S.C.R. 1 at 17.

The National Association of Japanese Canadians is of the view that any possibility of a Charter override is too great a threat to Canadian civil and human rights to be left unresolved. The NAJC is very concerned that the government is looking to a flawed legal opinion for its belief that the Emergencies Act has not given the Governor in Council the power to exercise Parliament's override powers under s.33 of the Charter. The possibility that this power could be used in secret Orders in Council is particularly worrying.

We ask for your support for an amendment to Bill C-77 like that set out above. If you have any questions or comments, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely yours,

M. Ann Sunahara.

ENCLOSURE (A) TO LETTER DATED JUNE 2, 1988

Can the Cabinet Override Charter Rights?

This question arises because of the legal force and effect given to the the War Measures Act. In a case contesting the War Measures Act the courts held that Parliament not only could delegate its constitutional powers to the executive government, but also that Parliament, in fact, delegated unlimited powers to the Cabinet, including the power "supersede the existing law whether resting on statute or otherwise": Re Gray (1919) 57 S.C.R. 150, per Fitzpatrick, C.J. at 157 - 158 and per Duff J. (as he then was) at 168. The English courts reached a similar conclusion with respect to the British Act on which the War Measures Act was based: R v. Halliday [1917] A.C. 260.

Under the War Measures Act, the Governor in Council (effectively the Cabinet) "is vested with plenary powers of legislation as large as and of the same nature as those of Parliament": Reference Re Regulations Relating to Chemicals [1943] S.C.R. 1 per Rinfret J. at 17- 18. An order properly passed under that Act, therefore, "may have the effect of an Act of Parliament": Ibid, per Duff C.J. at 9.

Under the general emergency powers in the War Measures Act, therefore, Parliament could not only delegate its constitutional powers without limit, but the orders and regulations passed by the Cabinet are equivalent to Acts of Parliament. Section 33 of the Charter permits Parliament to declare in an Act of Parliament that the Act shall operate notwithstanding the fundamental freedoms set out in Section 2 and the legal and equality rights set out in Sections 7 through 15 of the Charter. If Parliament can delegate this power to the Cabinet, and if wording of section 38 of the Emergencies Act transfers unlimited powers to the Cabinet in a war emergency, then the Cabinet would have the power to override important Charter rights when making emergency orders.

The counterarguments are that Parliament cannot delegate its Charter powers or that it must do so expressly. Both these arguments were rejected in Re Gray, supra, in Canada, and in R v. Halliday, supra, in England. Indeed, in Re Gray the Chief Justice put the onus on Parliament to expressly limit the powers it confers on the executive if that is its intention: at 160.

There is nothing in the Charter that prevents Parliament from delegating its powers to the executive. Legal precedent suggests that it can delegate its constitutional powers and has done so in the past both in the War Measures Act and in the various Acts dealing with the government of the North West Territories: See S.C. 1871, c. 16. Indeed in the latter case, Parliament had to revise its original delegation of powers to expressly forbid the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to pass laws inconsistent with those of Parliament: See S.C. 1873, c. 34.

We doubt that the intention of the drafters of the Charter was that the federal Cabinet should have an uncensored right to pass laws that override Charter rights. As Justice Mayrand noted in Alliance des Professeurs de Montreal et al. v. Attorney-General of Quebec (1985) 21

D.L.R. (4th) 354 (Que. C.A.), the Charter requires that a law overriding its provisions should specify precisely what provisions will be overridden in order to encourage "an enlightened and serious examination of the proposed legislation.": at 356. When Parliament overrides the Charter, it does so in the glare of publicity and public debate. If the Cabinet is able to override the Charter under war emergency powers, it will do so in the privacy and secrecy of Cabinet. Indeed, given the provisions for secret orders in the proposed Emergencies Act, it need not even tell Parliament or the Canadian people about the order overriding the Charter.

The use of such orders would be limited only by the imagination of the Cabinet. Property could be secretly confiscated. Special prisons could be set up. People could be incarcerated or executed without trial. Government money could be diverted for the private use of Cabinet members.

Not only could all these abuses occur in secrecy but, even if public, the judiciary can do nothing to protect the Charter rights. Where the clauses overriding the Charter are properly drafted, the courts cannot even require the government to prove the law overriding the Charter right was justifiable: Alliance de Professeurs de Montreal et al. v. Attorney-General of Quebec (1985) 21 D.L.R. (4th) 354 (Que. C.A.) per Mayrand J.A. at 356.

The wording of Section 38 of the Emergencies Act is very broad and may well give unlimited powers to the Cabinet. Because there is doubt about the delegation of the Charter override, we feel that this Committee should take to advice of the Chief Justice in Re Gray and expressly exclude the override power from Section 38.

Dear Sir,

The National Association of Japanese Canadians applauds the constructive changes to Bill C-77, the Emergencies Act, which have recently been proposed by your department and by the Legislative Committee on Bill C-77.

Unfortunately, we are of the view that they are not sufficient.

In our submission of March 15, 1988, we raised serious concerns about the possibility that the proposed Act might unwittingly give the Governor-in-Council the power to override the Charter. We are aware that this is contrary to your intention.

We are also informed that you have an opinion from the Department of Justice stating that the proposed Act does not include a Charter override. Since we have not seen that opinion, we cannot judge either how complete it is or the strength of its ultimate conclusion. Our own legal counsel are of the view that the question remains moot, given the law arising from the use of the War Measures Act.

We are of the view that this question is too important to all Canadians to be left to the opinion of lawyers, who may not be correct. Accordingly, we urge you to immediately make a reference of this important issue to the Supreme Court of Canada for a definitive ruling. Further, we urge that, should the Supreme Court find that override powers have been given to the Governor-in-Council, that the appropriate amendment be made to ensure that only Parliament can override Charter rights in time of emergency.

Sincerely yours,
The National Association of

Dear Mr. Miki:

Thank you very much for your letter of April 20, 1988 concerning the changes which have been made to Bill C-77, the Emergencies Act. I am gratified that you find the changes constructive and that they merit the applause of your organization.

I appreciate your wish to be reassured that Bill C-77 does not permit the Governor in Council to override the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, I am advised that there is very little basis for concern on this point, for the following reasons:

1. While it is true that the Supreme Court of Canada in the Chemicals Reference, [1943] S.C.R. 1 at 17, stated that the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act

"...is vested with plenary powers of legislation as large and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself", the Court also made clear that the Governor in Council only has that authority "when acting within those limits", that is when acting "within the ambit of the Act by which his authority is measured". It follows therefore that the powers of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act are not to be treated as coequal with those of Parliament under the Constitution Act 1867.

2. As broad as the executive authority of the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act may be, and even though Re Gray, 57 S.C.R. 150, held there that an order in council under the War Measures Act could amend an Act of Parliament, the Supreme Court of Canada is clear that this was only possible so long as the order in question is "in conformity with the conditions prescribed by ...the provisions of the War Measures Act" (Chemicals Reference at page 9). Therefore, while one Act of Parliament may be read as authorizing the Governor in Council to amend or repeal another Act of Parliament, it is very different to suggest that Parliament could authorize someone else to exercise its constitutional powers.

3. S. 33 is part of the Constitution Act 1867-1981 and hence cannot be treated like an ordinary Act of Parliament that is potentially subject to War Measures Act jurisprudence. For example, the reference to Parliament in s. 33 is the same as the reference to Parliament's lawmaking function under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, and yet it has never been suggested that the Governor in Council could be delegated the latter authority. In fact, the Chemicals Reference makes it clear that the Governor in Council was exercising authority on the basis of the War Measures Act rather than on Parliament's constitutional legislative authority under s. 91 of the Constitution Act.

4. The argument in question ignores the fact that the Charter clearly distinguishes between "Parliament" and "the government of Canada" (see ss. 32(1)(a), 36(1)) and "Parliament" and "the executive government of Canada" (S. 44). The necessary implication of this is that the powers or authority of the one were never intended to be exchanged with or delegated to the other.

5. Governor in Council powers under the War Measures Act or its successor must be exercised in conformity therewith. However, there is not the faintest suggestion in either that Parliament's power under s. 33 of the Charter may be exercised by the Governor in Council.

The thoughtful study of Bill C-77 undertaken by your Association and the helpful suggestions which resulted were influential in making C-77 a much improved Bill. The positive contribution of the National Association of Japanese Canadians to this work has been very much appreciated by the Government, and I would like to convey my personal thanks to you and to your associates.

Sincerely,

(Signed)

Dear Sir,

Thank you for your reply of May 5, 1988 to our concerns about a possible Charter override in the Emergencies Act.

We note your comment that, in your view, "there is very little basis for concern" and your reasons for holding that view.

However, having read those reasons, our legal counsel is of the view that they are seriously flawed in law. Please find attached a copy of her reasons.

Further, even if our legal counsel is wrong, we are of the view that any possibility that the Act would permit the Governor-in-Council to override Charter rights by Order-in-Council is too great a risk to the civil and human rights of Canadians to be left undecided and unknown. The Canadian people have a right to know the extent of the powers of the executive in time of emergency, and to know the boundaries of those powers with certainty.

Again we reiterate that this question is too important to all Canadians to be left to the opinion of lawyers. Accordingly, we urge you to immediately make a reference of this important issue to the Supreme Court of Canada for a definitive ruling. Dear Mr. Miki,

Re: Charter Override and the Reasons of the Minister Responsible for Emergency Preparedness

1.0 The following legal opinion comments upon the reasons cited by the Minister Responsible for Emergency Preparedness in his letter of May 5, 1988, for his belief that "there is very little basis for concern" about a Charter override in the Emergencies Act.

1.1 While my analysis is hindered by the summary nature of the Minister's reasons, I am forced to conclude that the Minister's legal counsel appear to have made the following errors:

(a) they have confused the concepts of subdelegation and intradelegation;

(b) they have failed to appreciate the legal basis for the Emergencies Act itself; and,

(c) they have misconstrued the Chemicals Reference [1943] S.C.R. 1 and the other War Measures Act cases.

(a) DELEGATION OF POWERS:

2.0 The Minister's reasons are predicated upon the assertion in reasons 2, 4 and 5 that Parliament cannot delegate its powers under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to the Governor in Council. This assertion is patently wrong in law. There is nothing express in the Constitution Acts, 1867-1981, which includes the Charter, about delegation of powers: Bora Laskin, Canadian Constitutional Law, 4th Ed., 1975, at 2. It has long been accepted that Parliament, as our sovereign body, can enact any law it chooses within the sphere of its powers, and therefore can enact a law delegating legislative powers to any subordinate body whether that body is the Governor in Council, a Minister of the Crown, or any other official or body: Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 1977, at 214; 217-218.

2.1 This delegation of powers to a subordinate is called subdelegation. Because the Governor in Council (in fact, the Cabinet or executive) is inferior to Parliament, and holds its powers from Parliament (with the exception of those powers it holds in common law or by royal prerogative), Parliament can delegate to the Governor in Council/Cabinet/executive whichever of its powers it wishes and with whatever restrictions it wishes.

2.2 The only bodies Parliament cannot delegate to are the Provinces. This is because Parliament and the provincial Legislatures are separate but equal entities under the Constitution Act, 1867 and subordination is necessary for subdelegation. Intradelegation between Parliament and the Provinces, therefore, is not possible, but subdelegation from Parliament to the executive is.

2.3 Therefore, contrary to the statements of the Minister, Parliament can constitutionally confer legislative powers upon the executive : Ibid at 216 and Laskin, supra, at 2 and Hodge v. The Queen (1883) 9 A.C. 117.

2.4 Indeed, Parliament has done so on several occasions in the past. The most notable examples of such subdelegation are the Northwest Territories Act R.S.C. 1970, c. N-22, ss. 8, 13; the Yukon Act R.S.C. 1970, c. Y-2, ss. 9, 16, as am; and the War Measures Act R.S.C. 1970, c. W-2.

2.5 The validity of the first two mentioned delegations of legislative power has never been challenged.

The third has. In Re Gray (1919) 57 S.C.R. 150 the Supreme Court of Canada found that Parliament had the ability to delegate law-making powers, and that it had done so validly in the War Measures Act notwithstanding that that delegation was very broad. Since Parliament retained the power to restrict or withdraw the grant of power to its delegate, the Governor in Council, the delegation of legislative power to the executive in the War Measures Act was constitutional: See Ibid at 215 - 216 and Re. Gray at 171.

2.6 In the War Measures Act, as the Minister's reasons acknowledge, Parliament delegated to the Governor in Council "plenary powers of legislation as large as and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself.": Chemicals Reference [1943] S.C.R. 1 at 17. At that time Parliament's powers were defined in ss. 91, 94 and 95 of the then British North America Act, now the Constitution Act, 1867. Those powers included the powers in the preamble to s. 91 to make laws for the "Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada" (P.O.G.G.). On three occasions the courts have upheld legislative Orders-in-Council under the War Measures Act which, but for the delegation of P.O.G.G. powers, would otherwise have been unconstitutional as infringing on matters assigned exclusively to the Provinces in s. 92: See Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Co. v. Manitoba Free Press [1923] A.C. 695 at 705; Wartime Leasehold Reference (1950) [1950] S.C.R. 124; and Co-operative Committee on Japanese Canadians v. Attorney-General of Canada et al [1947] A.C. 87.

2.7 This does not mean that the powers of the executive under the War Measures Act are equal to those of Parliament. They cannot be. Parliament must always retain the power to withdraw its grant of power from the executive. Otherwise the delegation of powers would amount to an abdication and hence would be illegal: See Re Gray, supra, at 171.

2.8 What it does mean is that under the War Measures Act the executive could make Orders-in-Council having the force and effect of statutes on behalf of and as if the executive were Parliament. Such Orders were valid in law so long as the executive was acting in good faith within the limits of the War Measures Act; that is,

(a) where a state of war or apprehended insurrection existed;

(b) where, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the Order was necessary; and,

(c) where the Order "could be enacted by Parliament, in the execution of its emergency powers, or otherwise; and, further more, that Parliament is not precluded by the British North America Act or by any other lawful enactment concerning legislative powers, from committing the subject matter of it to the Executive Government for legislative action.": Chemicals Reference, supra, per Duff C.J. at 10 - 11.

2.9 In summary, therefore, not only does Parliament have the power to delegate legislative power, but in the past it has delegated to the executive powers that were so broad that the executive was thereby authorized to make any order that Parliament, "in the execution of its emergency powers, or otherwise," was capable of making (Emphasis added).

(b) THE LEGAL BASIS OF THE EMERGENCIES ACT

3.0 The Emergencies Act has the same legal basis as the War Measures Act, which it replaces. Its stated purpose is to enable the government of Canada to respond quickly to emergencies without the cumbersome procedure of Parliament. As in the War Measures Act, Parliament in the Emergencies Act empowers the Governor in Council to make orders and regulations in its stead.

3.1 The question is: How broad are the powers given the executive in the Emergencies Act? On the plain reading of the Act they appear very broad indeed. In time of war emergency the Act expressly grants the executive the power to make:

"such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes on reasonable grounds are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.": s. 38(1).

As with the War Measures Act, the only restrictions are that there be an emergency; that the Governor in Council believes on reasonable grounds that the orders are necessary; and that Parliament be constitutionally capable of passing the order and is not barred from delegating the particular matter to the executive.

3.2 In the other three types of emergencies, the exercise of the powers is limited only by the subject matter of the orders and not by the breadth of powers exercised in the orders: See ss. 6(1), 17(1) and 28(1). In each case the Governor in Council is empowered to make:

"such orders or regulations with respect to the following matters, as the Governor in Council, believes on reasonable grounds are necessary for dealing with the emergency": 6(1), 17(1), 28(1)

3.3 Even in the least encompassing emergency, the public welfare emergency, the enumerated subject matters on which the executive may make orders and regulations make it clear that the executive is exercising s. 91 powers, including the "Peace, Order and good Government" (P.O.G.G.) powers. The enumerated subject matters include matters exclusively within the s. 92 powers of the Provinces, such as "the requisition, use or disposition of property": s. 6(1)(c). Such intrusions into provincial powers by the executive can only be legal where the powers delegated by Parliament to the Governor in Council include its P.O.G.G. powers.

3.4 The listed subject matters also evidence an intention to delegate other s. 91 powers. The ability to prescribe a sentence not exceeding five years imprisonment (s. 6(1)(j)) requires s. 91(27) criminal law powers. The "regulation of the distribution and availability of essential goods, services and resources" (s.6(1)(e)) requires s. 91(2) trade and commerce powers.

3.5 Finally, some of the enumerated subject matters require infringement of Charter rights. Section 17(1)(a) contemplates prohibiting the right to public assembly in section 2 of the Charter. Section 28(1)(g) permits prohibiting Canadians from leaving Canada, contrary to section 6 of the Charter. Section 28(1)(d) permits search and seizure without a warrant contrary to section 8 of the Charter.

3.6 Finally, there are the comments of the Minister himself. The Minister stated on February 23, 1988, to the Legislative Committee on Bill C-77 [the Emergencies Act] that "We will not be suspending the right to habeus corpus". The right to have the validity of detention determined by way of habeus corpus and to be released if the detention is not lawful, is a protected Charter right: s. 10(c). To imply that it can be suspended under the Emergencies Act is to imply that the executive under the Emergencies Act could infringe or override a Charter right.

3.7 The powers given in the Emergencies Act are very broad indeed, and, I submit, may be as broad as those of the War Measures Act. In short the Emergencies Act also appears to vest the executive "with plenary powers of legislation as large as and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself": Chemicals Reference, supra, at 17. The limitations placed on those powers are essentially the same:.

(a) that a state of national emergency exist;

(b) that, the Governor in Council believes on reasonable grounds that the Order is necessary; and,

(c) that the Order "could be enacted by Parliament, in the execution of its emergency powers, or otherwise; and, further more, that Parliament is not precluded by the British North America Act or by any other lawful enactment concerning legislative powers, from committing the subject matter of it to the Executive Government for legislative action.": Chemicals Reference, supra, per Duff C.J. at 10.

In other than a war emergency the executive's powers are further limited by the requirement that the order deal with a subject matter enumerated under section 6(1), 17(1) or 28(1) respectively.

(c) MISCONSTRUCTION OF WAR MEASURES ACT CASES

4.0 The Minister's counsel have misconstrued the War Measures Act cases, and in particular the Chemicals Reference case and the distinctions within it between the exercise of powers under the War Measures Act by the executive and the exercise of s. 91 powers by Parliament.

Counsel have failed to appreciate that the War Measures Act empowers the executive to make laws in Parliament's place and based on Parliament's constitutional powers. The Chemicals Reference stands for the principle that where Parliament

(i) has the constitutional ability to enact the order the executive has made; and,

(ii) has not been precluded from committing the subject matter of that order to the executive,

then the order of the executive is legal and of the same force and effect as if it had been enacted by Parliament itself: per Duff C.J. at 10.

4.1 The application of these principles to the issue of whether Parliament can or has delegated its powers under s. 33 of the Charter to the executive in the Emergencies Act produces the following analysis:

1. Parliament has the constitutional power to pass orders that override sections 2, and 7 - 15 of the Charter: s. 33.

2. Parliament has the ability to delegate its constitutional powers to subordinate body: Re Gray, supra at 171.

3. Parliament in the past has delegated "plenary powers of legislation" to the Governor in Council in the War Measures Act: Chemicals Reference, supra at 17.

4. The powers delegated under the Emergencies Act are as broad as those under the War Measures Act: paragraphs 3.1 to 3.6.

5. Parliament is not precluded by any lawful enactment from committing a Charter override to the executive: Laskin, supra at 2.

6. Therefore, Parliament is able to and, under the Emergencies Act, has empowered the executive to make Orders in Council which override Charter rights.

CONCLUSION:

With respect, the Minister's reasons are without substance in law. Indeed, if he were correct and Parliament were not capable of delegating legislative power, then the Emergencies Act would be illegal in its entirety and without force and effect.

Since Parliament can delegate legislative powers to subordinate bodies, and since the executive is such a subordinate body, then where that delegation is broad enough to grant the executive plenary powers of legislation, and where Parliament is not precluded from delegating the matter to the executive, Parliament can delegate any of its constitutional powers, including its power to override Charter rights. Contrary to the statements of the Minister, there exists a very strong basis for concern that the Emergencies Act empowers the executive to make Orders that override Charter rights.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS CANADA FACT SHEET

BILL C-77 INCORPORATES NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF JAPANESE CANADIANS RECOMMENDATIONS

Bill C-77, the Emergencies Act, was passed unanimously by the House of Commons on April 27, 1988. In its current form it incorporates almost all of the changes proposed by the National Association of Japanese Canadians (NAJC) when it appeared before the legislative committee. Key NAJC proposals and the corresponding provisions of Bill C-77 appear below:

NAJC Recommendation

Parliament, at all times, must be able to revoke or modify any declaration of an emergency; and,

Corresponding Provisions of Bill C-77

S.59 in its amended form incorporates this proposal.

NAJC RecommendationCorresponding Provisions
of Bill C-77

Parliament must at all times be able to amend or revoke any order or regulation made by the Cabinet.

S.61 provides for this.

All orders and regulations made under emergency powers must be directly related to alleviating the particular emergency.

All orders and regulations must be "necessary for dealing with the emergency."

Whether emergency orders and regulations are, in fact, directly related to the emergency must be reviewable at all times in a court of law, and the burden of proving the direct relationship shall rest with the government.

Government must have "reasonable grounds" for issuing all orders and regulations. This would be reviewable by courts, upon application by any individual or organization which had standing.

"National emergency" should be defined.

Defined in S.3

Any delegation of emergency powers by Parliament to the Cabinet must be predicated upon a threat to the continued existence of Canada itself.

National emergencies must "seriously threaten the ability of the government of Canada to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada". S.3(b)

NAJC RecommendationCorresponding Provisions
of Bill C-77

Orders and regulations for war must be limited to measures strictly necessary and directly related to the emergency in question; and,

Orders and regulations for war would be limited to measures which on "reasonable grounds" are "necessary or advisable" for dealing with the emergency.

The burden of proving that the orders are strictly necessary and directly related to the emergency must rest with the Government.

This would be the case. The onus would be on government to divulge its "reasonable grounds" to court.

No order or regulation should take effect before it is approved by Parliament.

S.61 and 62 include provisions requiring approval, but to delay immediate action when necessary in an emergency could cost lives.

The operation of all orders and regulations must be subject to the review of a Special Parliamentary Committee.

S.62 provides for just such review.

Debate upon a motion to amend or revoke an order or regulation shall be without closure.

Such debate must be "without interruption" and closure is not provided for.

NAJC RecommendationCorresponding Provisions
of Bill C-77

In any review of the use of emergency powers, or in any trial of an accused charged under an emergency order, the onus of proving that the emergency exists and the order is reasonable must rest with the Cabinet.

Government must have "reasonable grounds" for invocation and would be required to demonstrate this before the courts.

Any emergency legislation must expressly deny the power to override rights guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Charter itself prohibits this.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REVISED MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons which reads as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Monday, June 20, 1988

Ordered,—That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendments 6(b) and 12(c) made by the Senate to Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, but disagrees with amendments 1(a), 2, 5, 6(a), 7, 8, 9(a), (b) and (c), 10, and 12(a) and (b), because this House believes they contradict the principles of the Bill for the following reasons:

Amendment 1(a) would imply that the right to counsel of choice would no longer be subject to the requirement that the adjudicator assign counsel at the expense of the Minister where counsel of choice is not reasonably available; arguments over this erroneous implication could be used to delay the refugee determination process.

Amendment 2 would result in the recommencement of every hearing where the claimant indicates a fear of return only after substantive evidence has been heard, providing an opportunity for abuse by those who lack a credible basis for a claim or who would seek to delay or avoid removal by frustrating the "safe" third country mechanism.

Amendment 5 would introduce subjective elements which cannot be easily proven or rejected, thus opening a major loophole in the "safe" third country mechanism.

Amendment 6(a) arises out of Senate amendment 9(a), but is not consistent with the House amendment to Senate amendment 9(a), as set out below.

Amendment 7 would impair the effective elaboration of the "safe" third country list without improving the quality of the protection available to the claimant.

Amendment 8 would extend the scope and nature of Refugee Division hearings, significantly increasing the workload of the Division and thereby delaying decision-making for all claimants.

Amendments 9(b) and (c) arise out of Senate amendment 9(a), but are not consistent with House amendment to Senate amendment 9(a), as set out below.

Amendment 10 would change a fundamental principle that there be one high quality hearing on the merits of the claim by competent decision-makers, which hearing represents a proper balance between fairness and efficiency.

Amendment 12(a) would frustrate the selection of the best possible candidates, including present members, for each division of the new Board.

Amendment 12(b) is consequential on amendment 12(a), which is not acceptable, and is therefore inappropriate.

And, that this House agrees with the principles set out in amendments 1(b), 3, 4 and 11, but would propose the following amendments:

"member of the applicant's family who is in Canada is a"

(h) by striking out lines 12 to 15 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"(d) the person or any member of the person's family for whom landing is sought was determined not to be eligible to be granted landing for a reason other than the removal order; or

(e) the person and each member of the person's family for whom landing is sought were determined to be,"

(i) by striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) grant landing to the person and each member of the person's family for whom landing is sought, where the person is a person described in paragraph (5)(d) or (e) and the adjudicator is satisfied that, but for the removal order, the person and each member are eligible to be grant"

and

That the Bill be further amended in Clause 18 by striking out line 37 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"hold office during good behaviour for a term not"

and

That the Bill be further amended in Clause 29 by adding immediately after line 46 at page 55 the following:

"(7) Section 115 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(5) The Minister may establish and appoint the members of a committee to advise the Minister with respect to the prescribing of countries under paragraph (1)(r)."

and

That the Bill be further amended by adding immediately after line 31 at page 56 the following:

"32. Section 123 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"123. The Minister or the Deputy Minister, as the case may be, may authorize such persons employed in the public service of Canada as the Minister or the Deputy Minister deems proper to exercise and perform any of the powers, duties and functions that may or are required to be exercised or performed by the Minister or the Deputy Minister, as the case may be, under this Act or the regulations, other than the powers, duties and functions referred to in paragraphs 19(1)(e) and (2)(a), sub-sections 39(2) and 40(1), subparagraph 48.01(1)(e)(iii) and subsections 82.1(2) and 83(1), and any such power, duty or function performed or exercised by any person so authorized shall be deemed to have been performed or exercised by the Minister of Deputy Minister, as the case may be."

FIFTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE REINSTATED

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, the week before last I withdrew from the order paper the fifth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, with the unanimous consent of the house. I have been informed by members of the joint committee that I should not have withdrawn it. If permission is granted, I should like to reinstate the fifth report.

If you allow me, I will move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robichaud:

That the Order of the Day for the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages (Calgary Olympic Winter Games), presented in the Senate on 17th December, 1987, which was discharged on 15th June, 1988, be reinstated on the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MARGARET THATCHER PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that the address of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Wednesday, June 22, 1988, together with all introductory and related speeches, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: We are not formally allowing it into the record as part of the platform of the Conservative Party in the next election; we are just allowing that it be made part of the record of the Senate.

Senator Marshall: Stand up when you say that!

(For text of speeches, see Appendix "A", p. 3779.)

PRIVATE BILL

MONTREAL TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 28, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-17, An Act to authorize the Montreal Trust Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 14, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Michel Cogger: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would prefer to have third reading of this bill at the next sitting so that we can have an opportunity to look at the report. At the moment I know of no reason why it will not pass.

On motion of Senator Cogger, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 28, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-51, An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 14, 1988, examined the said Bill and has heard from officials of thirteen organizations who had asked to appear.

As a result of its study the Committee now proposes that the Bill C-51 be adopted without amendment.

Having found, however, that there were certain incorrect cross-references in the Bill as passed by the House of Commons, the Committee has asked that these editorial errors be corrected in the parchment of the Bill by officials of both Houses prior to its third reading in the Senate.

The Committee has also requested that arrangements be made with the House of Commons for the printing and distribution of a reprint of the Bill reflecting these corrections.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR TREMBLAY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Tremblay: With leave, honourable senators, later today, if the editorial errors mentioned in the report which has just been read have been corrected; otherwise, tomorrow, if certain delays should occur in this regard.

● (1410)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Spivak, that this bill be read the third time later this day.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Tremblay: Later this day, if the corrections mentioned in the report have been made this afternoon; otherwise third reading might take place tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes. I think I understand Senator Tremblay's intention. I suppose that, strictly speaking, we are not agreeing to have it adjourned until later this day unless something happens, but we are adjourning it to later this day to wait and see if something else is going to happen. It is a little different.

Senator Doody: You got that one straight!

Senator Frith: That hair was pretty well split!

[Senator Tremblay.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Senator Frith: Anyway, we agree.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have two reports from the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. I do not have the printed texts here. I ask that leave be given to revert to this item later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: In case anyone wonders what happened to the fifty-sixth report, it has already been presented.

QUESTION PERIOD

ABORTION

BOROWSKI APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—LACK OF GROUNDS—INTERVENTION BY REAL WOMEN—REASON FOR GOVERNMENT INACTION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I gave him notice of them earlier today. Before I ask them, I should like to say to the Leader of the Government, to his staff and, indeed, to anyone else who prepared it, that the answer given by Senator Doody on page 3713 of Debates of the Senate of June 21 to my question concerning employment equity is a first-rate answer. It is the best one I have ever seen here and I am very grateful to you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marsden: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada is not instructing counsel to move to strike from the list the appeal of Joe Borowski to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Borowski was originally given standing specifically to challenge section 251 of the Criminal Code. Now that the Supreme Court, in its Morgentaler decision, has declared section 251 null and void, there is no legislation for Mr. Borowski to be challenging, and his case is only about abstract questions of law, which, in our legal system, can be brought to the Supreme Court only by the federal government on a reference case under the Supreme Court Act.

I should like to ask the second question at the same time. Why did the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada not instruct his counsel to oppose the application of REAL Women to intervene in Mr. Borowski's appeal when that application for intervention was over six months too late, under the Supreme Court rules?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am pleased, of course, that our colleague, Senator Marsden, found the reply to her question regarding employment equity so satisfactory. I shall pass on her comments to those responsible, and possibly to other departments as well, so that this type of reply may be considered exemplary.

I thank Senator Marsden also for having given notice of her two questions of today. The reply that has been furnished to me by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, is as follows.

First, the question of who is allowed to intervene before the Supreme Court of Canada is a matter for that court to decide. In the Borowski appeal the Minister of Justice did not approve or consent to the intervention of REAL Women, or LEAF—the Women's Legal, Education and Action Fund.

As the honourable senator knows, litigation and appeal follow a process governed by the court. Mr. Borowski applied for an early hearing in June. As part of that process, the Supreme Court of Canada ordered that written arguments by the parties be filed with the court by a specified time. The Attorney General will be filing his position according to the court order, and his position will be known and clear at that time. The courts are open to anyone to bring a claim or an issue before them.

Senator Marsden: I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for his reply.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

GOVERNMENT CONSULTANTS INTERNATIONAL—COMPLIANCE WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONTRACTING PROGRAM

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I received in my mail last week—and I am sure many other honourable senators did as well—a handsome brochure from Government Consultants International, with a letter from David MacDonald announcing he had become a consultant.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): From whom?

Senator Marsden: David MacDonald. I have no idea which David MacDonald. Let me ask my question and that will become irrelevant.

Government Consultants International will be known to everyone in this house. In the brochure they list their ten directors, all of whom are men, and their consultants, all of whom are men.

The Federal Government Contracting Program requires that any company doing $200,000 worth of business or more a year with the federal government must engage in employment equity. I, of course, have no idea how much business GCI does with the federal government, but from newspaper accounts alone one would expect that figure to be over $200,000 a year.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to check whether that company has filed, under the Federal Government Contracting Program, an employment equity plan.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, subject to correction, I doubt very much that the organization referred to by the honourable senator does business with the federal government in the sense she means. If I understand correctly, this is a private sector consulting firm. It may do considerably more than $200,000 worth of business in the private sector, but I am not aware that that company does any business with the federal government.

Senator Marsden: Nonetheless, would the minister be kind enough to see whether this firm has contracts with the federal government worth that amount or more, because the Federal Government Contracting Program, of course, operates with private sector companies?

Senator Murray: As I said, I spoke subject to correction as to the relationship of this company with the government. I shall certainly seek confirmation of the impression I have, which I conveyed to the Senate a few minutes ago.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question on the same subject I have been asking questions on for several weeks, and that is the continuing drought in western Canada. I do not want to be repetitive, but the questions on the minds of thousands of farmers and ranchers out there are the same this week as last week, except they are more intense now because there has been no appreciable rainfall in any part of western Canada that I know of. I am not saying that there has not been any rainfall; there may have been some showers, but there certainly has not been, to my knowledge, any appreciable precipitation to relieve the drought conditions anywhere. The situation has now deteriorated to such an extent that the seriousness of it is beyond any partisan consideration. Can the Leader of the Government give us any idea, today, when the government will reach a decision on what it is going to do to be helpful in this disastrous situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend can expect an early announcement on the part of the Minister of Agriculture on this matter.

Senator Olson: The same problem always arises, honourable senators, when we talk about "early". Does that mean later this week or next week?

Senator Bonnell: This afternoon!

Senator Olson: Senator Bonnell suggests this afternoon. Is that what it means, or is it going to be in the next day or two?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it will be done soon, but I am not in a position to state exactly at what hour of what day the minister will be making an announcement on this matter, but it will not be delayed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

ALBERTA LEGISLATION—RIGHTS OF FRANCOPHONE MINORITY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—APPLICATION OF BENEFITS TO MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, in his position as minister responsible for federal-provincial relations, whether or not the federal government has received a request from any one or more of the francophone associations in Alberta for the assistance of the federal government respecting a new Alberta language law that was brought into the legislature a few days ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, such a request would normally be directed to my colleague, the Secretary of State. I will ask him whether, since the proposed legislation was tabled in the Alberta legislature, any formal request has come from the francophone association of that province.

Mr. Lucien Bouchard and I met with representatives of the Alberta francophones some weeks ago to discuss their concerns about the legislation that was then pending. Since our meeting we have heard from them. I do believe that Mr. Bouchard has been in touch with them since the bill was tabled in Edmonton, or that he very soon will be in touch with them again.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that this consideration and discussion about the language law has taken place, can the minister indicate what action the federal government is contemplating to achieve the objective the francophone association has indicated it is seeking?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have seen, as perhaps my friend has, the representations of the francophone organization to the Alberta government. As I have said publicly, they are extremely modest, moderate and reasonable, and we would have hoped that the Alberta government would give a more positive response to those representations.

There is not a great deal of scope for unilateral action open to the Government of Canada on this matter. I simply draw the attention of the honourable senator to the fact that in the case of Saskatchewan we were able to negotiate—first with the Government of Saskatchewan—an agreement that provided for very considerable improvements in the status of and in the services available to French Canadians living in that province. We went on to negotiate an agreement with the French Canadian Association as well as the Fransaskois to assist them with their activities.

In the case of Alberta, we believe the best avenue to pursue is that of negotiation leading to an agreement with that government to improve the services available to French Canadians in Alberta in terms of legislation, education and other government services.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the reply of the Leader of the Government indicates that the federal government was able to negotiate successfully with the Government of Saskatchewan prior to its legislature's action. By implication, that reply also indicates that the federal government has been attempting to negotiate with the Government of Alberta but has not been similarly successful. Is that what has happened to attempted negotiations with Alberta?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as long ago as last February, in the aftermath of the Mercure decision, my colleague the Minister of Justice indicated in the House of Commons that the Government of Canada was ready, willing and able to give assistance to the government of Alberta to enable that province to provide an adequate level of service to the French-speaking population of that province. That was reiterated, I believe, in May. Again in June the Prime Minister wrote to Premier Getty on the matter.

The Government of Alberta has indicated some interest in negotiating with us our participation in terms of the assistance we may give to Alberta to enable that government to implement fully section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms respecting minority language education rights and to assist that government to comply fully with the provisions of the Criminal Code with regard to criminal trials being conducted in Alberta in the French language. For our part, we have indicated to Alberta that we would be prepared to discuss these matters, but we also wish to enter into fairly intensive discussions concerning legislation, civil proceedings in court, education and other services that could be made available to the French-speaking population of the province.

Honourable senators, it is not a matter of negotiations having failed. We want to intensify the negotiations, and we hope that they will have the same productive result as that which took place in Saskatchewan.

Senator Olson: I understand that the Attorney General of Alberta, Mr. Horsman, has publicly stated that he will seek all of the assistance that has been offered by the federal government for education, and the various other services the Leader of the Government has just mentioned. What I am curious about, however, is that the provincial government seems to be proceeding with its legislation in any event. That falls somewhat short of the mark in terms of defining the official status of the French language in Alberta. In a number of areas the French language does not seem to have the status it enjoys in most other parts of Canada.

Is the Leader of the Government just expressing a hope in this regard or does he have a commitment from the Government of Alberta that it will delay—if that is the right word—the final passage of this legislation until the negotiations have been completed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have no such commitment from the Government of Alberta, and I have the same understanding as that of my friend, that it intends to proceed with the legislation. Having said that, that would still not stop us from negotiating a proper agreement with the province in the areas of legislation, education, civil and criminal proceedings in the courts and the extension of other services to the French Canadian population of Alberta.

● (1430)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question supplementary to Senator Olson's question. Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or any of his colleagues, been in communication with anyone in the Alberta government since this legislation was brought forward, expressing the disappointment of the federal government, inasmuch as the limited response from the Government of Alberta on the language issue does not seem to reflect what the government would have hoped was the spirit of Meech Lake?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I took several occasions that presented themselves to me prior to the tabling of the legislation to express the concern of the federal government about the plans of the Alberta government. I spoke to my interlocutor of that government, the Attorney General and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Mr. Horsman, and others of my colleagues did likewise.

[Senator Murray.]

As I indicated, Mr. Lucien Bouchard and I met with the Franco-Albertans several weeks ago. On the day the bill was tabled I did have a telephone conversation with Mr. Horsman, when I again indicated the concern of the federal government and our disappointment that, in light of the very moderate, modest and reasonable representations that had been made by the Franco-Albertans, the Government of Alberta had not chosen to respond in a more positive manner.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is also a supplementary on this same issue.

The minister indicated that negotiations are currently under way with the Government of Alberta. In the event that these negotiations give greater benefits to Alberta than presently accrue to the province of Manitoba, which also has agreements with the federal government, may we have the assurance of the minister that those benefits will be available to Manitoba and Saskatchewan, if they have concluded their negotiations?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the situations in the province of Manitoba on the one hand and the other two provinces on the other hand are somewhat different in that, as the honourable senator knows, Manitoba is bound by the provisions of the Constitution in these matters. The Government of Canada has entered into a sound and practical arrangement with the Government of Manitoba. I am not familiar enough with it to know in what way it may differ from the agreement that was made with Saskatchewan or any future agreement that may be made with Alberta.

It is always open to our friends in the provinces to draw to our attention any discrepancies that they think are unfair in any way. Of course, we always take these matters into consideration.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has told us of his concern and disappointment. When speaking with Mr. Horsman, did he indicate that there was a possibility that the Alberta government might reconsider what it had done in order that it not disappoint the government any further or create greater concern, in view of the fact that it supports the Official Languages Act? I am sure that the pressure being placed on Alberta by the federal government requires that the Province of Alberta give this further consideration.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my last conversation with Mr. Horsman was, as I indicated earlier, on the day that the bill was tabled in the legislature. Because I did not think it would be productive to do so, I did not suggest to him that he withdraw his bill. I did suggest that the Government of Canada would want to intensify its negotiations with his government not only in the areas of education and criminal trials, which are of particular interest to his government, but also in the areas of legislation and civil proceedings and other services that might be made available to the French-Canadian people of Alberta.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, since we are talking about bilingualism, the Province of Prince Edward Island, through its premier, did agree, without much ado, to have bilingualism in the province, and the premier was pleased to cooperate with the federal government. That is what a Liberal government will do. It will go forward with liberal views. We hope that that will also happen in Alberta. I hope that any help the federal government gives to Alberta or to any of the other provinces will also apply to Prince Edward Island.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

EQUAL APPLICATION OF BENEFITS UNDER PROVISIONS OF B.N.A. ACT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the section of the British North America Act which states:

That the Dominion Government shall assume and defray all the charges for the following services, viz:—

The salary of the Lieutenant Governor;

The salaries of the Judges of the Superior Court and of the District or County Courts when established;

The charges in respect of the Department of Customs;

The Postal Department;

The protection of the Fisheries;

The provision for the Militia;

The Lighthouses, Shipwrecked Crews, Quarantine and Marine Hospitals;

The Geological Survey;

The Penitentiary;

Efficient Steam Service for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, Winter and Summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion;—

It goes on to say, honourable senators:

And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with the services with, the services which by the "British North America Act, 1867," appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to other Provinces;

That the railways under contract and in course of construction for the Government of the Island, shall be the property of Canada;—

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Did you include in negotiations with the Premier of Prince Edward Island an agreement with the Government of Canada whereby Prince Edward Island would be treated the same as the other provinces, as it must be under the British North America Act? The British North America Act states that you will make the same payments to Prince Edward Island pertaining to other things as are or may be allowed to other provinces. In other words, if you allowed $800 million to Newfoundland—it is another province—for the abandoning of the railroad, then, automatically, you would have to make a substantial grant to Prince Edward Island for the abandonment of the railroad there as well.

During the negotiations there last week, can you advise the Senate how many hundreds of millions of dollars you promised Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that is a novel interpretation of the 1867 act, and I shall have to take counsel on it.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—APPLICATION FOR GRANT FOR MANUFACTURE OF POTATO BAGS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I will ask the Leader of the Government a different question. Since he does not seem to understand about the British North America Act, certainly he understands the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency—that is one thing he understands well. He has told us many times that it is run in the area; the approval will be made in the area by the people down there; and they have a board of directors who make these decisions.

As I understand it, the board of directors met on June 8 in Halifax and considered many applications for grants. One of the applications before the board, which was approved by the board of directors in Halifax on June 8, was from the Island Packing Company Limited for making paper bags for potatoes in Prince Edward Island. All the potato producers in Prince Edward Island approved the plan, and all the other applications that went before that board of directors on June 8 were signed and approved by Mr. McPhail, except the one from Island Packers for Prince Edward Island paper potato bags.

● (1440)

Last week I contacted Mr. McPhail, who told me that within a day or two they would make some kind of decision. However, honourable senators, as yet there has been no decision. I understand that this matter is now on the minister's desk. Apparently, a decision of the minister is necessary, since this is a political matter.

A letter dated June 15 from the law firm of Scales, Jenkins and McQuaid was then sent to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, a copy of which went to Senator Lowell Murray, laying out the details of this matter. Honourable senators, we have still received no decision.

Can the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what is holding up this application, since in another month potatoes will be on the market and we must have the bags in which to export these potatoes to the world market? My question to the minister is: When can we expect a decision from this agency regarding these potato bags?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the board in question that examines applications from commercial firms is the board of the Atlantic Enterprise Program. Unless the eligible costs were $5 million or more, such an application would not, in the normal course of events, come to my desk at all. However, if there is a disagreement on the matter as between the recommendation of the board and the recommendation of my officials, then it might come to me for adjudication. If it does, I will examine the facts and make a decision.

In any case, I will see what information I can obtain within the next day or so that I can properly convey to the house and to the public on this matter at this time.

Senator Bonnell: Is the minister telling me that he did not receive a copy of the letter dated June 15 from Mr. John A. McQuaid of the firm of Scales, Jenkins & McQuaid?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must confess that I have not seen the letter to which my friend refers. However, that does not mean that I have not heard something about the case that he has just raised, and I expect to hear more about it in the next little while.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TWELFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 28, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that committee meetings held outside Ottawa on sitting days and committee meetings held during adjournments of the Senate be noted in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

[Senator Murray.]

Tuesday, June 28, 1988

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that where a committee reports a bill without amendment or where a committee recommends amendments to a bill, the report not contain any background information, observations or recommendations.

Any background information, observations or recommendations respecting a bill that is reported by a committee may be tabled separately by the committee Chairman and printed in the final issue of the committee proceedings on the bill.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1988-89

SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-138, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1989.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you today, Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1988-89, provides for the release of the balance of the Main Estimates for 1988-89 amounting to some $29.5 billion, and the whole of Supplementary Estimates (A), 1988-89 amounting to about $113.9 million. The total spending authority requested by this bill is just under $30 billion.

The Main Estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 1, 1988, and were referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. These Estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on March 23, 1988. The committee presented a report to the Senate on these Estimates on June 7, 1988.

The Supplementary Estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on May 19, 1988, and were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Officials of the Department of Agriculture and of the Treasury Board Secretariat discussed the Estimates with the committee on May 26, 1988. As honourable senators may be aware, the total payments made in the first year were $114 million lower than anticipated. Accordingly, that amount is required this fiscal year to maintain the program funding at the total level previously announced. The committee presented a report to the Senate on these Estimates on June 1, 1988.

Honourable senators, I should also like to table the total Estimates tabled to date for 1988-89 and the supply to date for 1988-89 and ask that they be printed as part of today's Debates of the Senate.

Honourable senators, I wish to assure this house that this bill is in the usual form and that there are no surprises attached.

(See Appendix "B", p. 3786.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we have said on other occasions, the Senate very seldom—and in my experience never—has refused the government supply, but that does not mean we are not interested in the subject of the Estimates. That is why Senator Doody has pointed out that we follow the procedure of referring, without debate, the Estimates to our Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which then studies them and reports to the Senate. That way the Senate has some material to consider when the supply bill or the appropriation bill that follows the Estimates is presented to us for approval.

Therefore, honourable senators, I draw your attention to the reports of the committee on the Estimates and the explanation given by the chairman of the committee, Senator Leblanc. The report of the committee itself is in the Debates of the Senate of June 7, 1988, at page 3611. There the committee reports on the explanation given by Mr. Mazankowski, the President of the Treasury Board, with reference to the Main Estimates, and the figures are there set out. The report says:

... the government expects to make budgetary expenditures totalling $132.3 billion. Of this, the government has identified $119.4 billion in the Estimates representing a 7.7% increase over comparable estimates from the previous fiscal year. The remaining $12.9 billion is reserved for supplementary expenditures and other provisions.

and these are identified in Table I to the report as Appendix A.

The only other items I think worth highlighting from the report itself are those found on page 3612, as follows:

However, in its report on Comprehensive Auditing (Eighteenth Report),—

That is, of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—the Committee stated:

When governments establish programs with objectives that foster multi-year financial commitments, but with uncertain timing, those objectives may not be consistent with a system of annual appropriations; in short achieving effectiveness may not be consistent with legislative compliance.

I continue with the quotation:

The Committee wishes to remind the government once again of this important fact and to indicate that in its future business, the Committee will watch for and report on instances where legislative compliance and annual appropriations may not lead to effectiveness.

Turning then to the explanations given by the chairman of the committee following that report, those comments appear at page 3677 of the Debates of the Senate of June 15 of this year, and again the figures I have just mentioned are repeated. At the bottom of that page, the chairman said:

● (1450)

Some Committee members said they were concerned about the difficulty experienced by the government in reducing the annual deficit, when so much of the annual estimates were taken up with statutory expenditures.

That is a longstanding concern of members of that committee and I believe of the Senate itself. Then, on page 3678, the honourable senator is reported as saying:

Committee members took this opportunity to remind the government of its past observations about the incompatibility of the legislative requirement of annual appropriations with programs with uncertain timing of expenditures.

That is a reference to the quotation that I had already made from the report itself. With those caveats and observations on the record, I believe that we should support this appropriation bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe we should adopt the motion for third reading now rather than following the usual procedure of one day's notice, because the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate has advised that he has plans for Royal Assent today.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND (CODE 9956)—SECOND READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-135, to amend the Customs Tariff (code 9956).

He said: Honourable senators, the amendments contained in Bill C-135 are of a technical and non-controversial nature.

Senator Frith: Famous last words!

Senator Phillips: They extend the specified period for the prohibition of the importation of obscene materials. Customs officers are frequently confronted with people who wish to import obscene materials, which include child pornography and other such items considered not desirable. Under the provisions of the Customs Tariff now before us, customs' officials must prohibit the importation of such materials and thereby prevent them from entering the Canadian market. As honourable senators may recall, a sunset clause was initially inserted into the provision in 1985 in anticipation of new legislation on pornography that would include amendments to the Customs Tariff and the Criminal Code. The original sunset clause has since been amended on two separate occasions in order to extend the prohibition while the proposed pornography legislation was under consideration by Parliament. The current prohibition is now set to expire on June 30, 1988. The date included in the sunset clause has approached much more rapidly than Bill C-54, which is under consideration in the other place. In order to continue the prohibition on the importation of obscene materials, I urge the Senate to give rapid approval to this amendment contained in Bill C-135.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the technical information given by Senator Phillips is, I believe, quite correct. If honourable senators will look at the bill, they will see that it is very short and, I suppose, in that sense, it is not controversial. In fact, it contains just one clause, which reads as follows:

1. Code 9956 in Schedule VII to the Customs Tariff is amended by striking out the words following paragraph (d) thereof and substituting the following therefor:

“(This code expires December 31, 1989.)”

I asked for a copy of code 9956, and it prohibits:

Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind that

(a) are deemed to be obscene under subsection 159(8) of the Criminal Code;

(b) constitute hate propaganda within the meaning of subsection 281.3(8) of the Criminal Code;

(c) are of a treasonable character within the meaning of section 46 of the Criminal Code; or

(d) are of a seditious character within the meaning of sections 60 and 61 of the Criminal Code.

Now we come to the words that this bill is particularly concerned with, and they are:

(This code expires June 30, 1988)

Honourable senators, I am putting the actual code on the record because I asked someone to watch the debate in the other place, and that person reported to me that at least one member of the House of Commons, a member of the NDP, stated that he felt uncomfortable passing this legislation so quickly and hoped that the Senate would take a careful look at it to be sure that it was in order.

Senator Stanbury: An NDP member said that?

Senator Roblin: Extraordinary!

Senator Frith: That is why I have put it on the record.

[Senator Phillips.]

An additional point that should go on the record is the political context of this legislation. Senator Phillips touched upon it. As he pointed out, Bill C-54 has been the subject of some controversy. That is, there are some elements in the country, including political parties, that do not agree on Bill C-54. Though they support the idea of curtailing and properly controlling pornography, they feel that Bill C-54 goes too far. Of course, Bill C-54 would have made Bill C-135 unnecessary, because it includes a solution to this problem of the expiry of the code item.

I also asked for and received a copy of the minister's speech, for which I thank the department. In it the minister made some of the points that Senator Phillips made, and he also recognized that Bill C-54 was a matter of some debate in the House of Commons and in the country generally. So I suppose one could say that the passage of this bill takes the heat off Bill C-54. However, I do not think that that is a reason to permit the uninhibited flow of pornographic material at the border. In the absence of Bill C-54, the only way to solve that problem—and we have the undertaking of the government that they are not going to be in a position to have Bill C-54 passed—is to pass the bill before us.

• (1500)

However, as a further assurance to those in the House of Commons who want to be sure that we do our job properly, I hope that Senator Phillips, when we give the bill second reading, as I propose we do today, will move that we consider the bill with the minister in Committee of the Whole before third reading. In that way we will have the opportunity to be our usual careful and efficient selves in making sure that this bill ought to be passed as quickly here as it was in the other place.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Bélisle in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to take into consideration Bill C-135, to amend the Customs Tariff (code 9956).

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the minister, the Honourable Tom Hockin, is outside. I would ask permission to invite him to join us for consideration of the bill.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Tom Hockin, Minister of State (Finance), was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to introduce the minister responsible for this bill, the Honourable Tom Hockin. He, in turn, will introduce his official. I am sure he will invite questions from you.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure now to invite Mr. Hockin to introduce his official and to make an opening statement if he so wishes.

The Hon. Tom Hockin, Minister of State (Finance): Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I have with me today Ms. Carole Nelder-Corvari from the Department of Finance.

I am here to introduce and speak briefly to the bill before us. This is an extension to the present Customs Act, which will allow us to continue to prohibit pornographic literature, seditious literature, hate literature and the like at the border without changing any of the content of our legislation with regard to that area. We are just extending the deadline.

The right to prohibit these goods will expire on June 30, and this bill will extend that deadline for another 18 months.

Of course, we had hoped to extend this authority with Bill C-54, but at present Bill C-54 has not passed the House of Commons. Therefore, this has to be done by way of this separate bill.

Honourable senators will know that the House of Commons very quickly passed this bill, without dispute, this morning, because it is very important that we continue to enforce the proper prohibitions on this material at the border. If this bill is not passed by July 1, we will be vulnerable to this material coming in since we would have no legal authority to stop it.

Essentially, this bill, as I have said, affects obscene material, hate propaganda, treasonable material and seditious material.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, the bill before us is made necessary because it is improbable that Bill C-54 will be sent to this place at all in this session of Parliament.

Mr. Hockin: I would not assume that, Mr. Chairman. If we can receive the cooperation and a careful but reasonably quick treatment of Bill C-54 in the House, then the premise of the senator's statement would not be true. I do not think we should jump to any conclusions about this not occurring before an election or before the end of this session.

Senator Frith: The reason I say that is that unless there is something wrong with my arithmetic the mandate of the present government expires in September of 1989.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, I will not get into a debate about that. I think, in fact, it could go longer, but I would defer to Senator Frith on matters of constitutional expertise with regard to that.

The point here is that 18 months is a moderate period to give a signal, and the signal is this: that we have every intention of having our legislation with regard to pornography and other matters passed in a reasonable period of time. If we had had no intention of doing that, we would have asked for an extension of, say, three or four years. Eighteen months is a signal that we want to pass the bill in the very near future, not in the distant future.

Senator Frith: If there were an election close to the end of the five-year period, assuming that it is not extended, then you would have an additional few months for extension of this code until the end of the year 1989; is that correct?

Mr. Hockin: That is right.

Senator Frith: The items of the code that are extended are printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs and other representations of any kind that are deemed to be obscene under section 159(8) of the Criminal Code. At least Bill C-54, if it had been passed, would have looked after that, and made this unnecessary.

• (1510)

Mr. Hockin: Yes, because C-54 is about questions of obscenity.

Senator Frith: Right.

(b) hate propaganda within the meaning of subsection 281.3(8) of the Criminal Code.

Is that dealt with? Would that have been affected by Bill C-54?

Mr. Hockin: I do not believe so.

Senator Frith: Therefore, (b) would have to have been extended anyway, is that right?

Mr. Hockin: Yes.

Senator Frith:

(c) of a treasonable character within the meaning of section 46 of the Criminal Code.

Again, if you had wanted to extend that, you would have been here on this—C-54 or not—some time before June 30. Is that correct?

Mr. Hockin: That is right.

Senator Frith: And:

(d) of a seditious character within the meaning of section 60 and 61 of the Criminal Code.

That also would have been in that category.

Mr. Hockin: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Frith: Why was the June 30 date or sunset applied to (b), (c) and (d) if there was no legislation pending to supersede that expiry?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, they have always been kept together as part of the same prohibition, and that is why they have not been unbundled.

Senator Frith: The government then has no intention of bringing in other legislation to replace (b), (c) and (d) or it would simply have asked for the extension of the time in the normal course, when clock ticking was imminent, as provided for in the June 30 date; is that right?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, I think that is largely right, although there have been some questions and discussions in the other place about the handling of hate literature.

Senator Frith: All right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Those are my questions.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Frith. Senator Buckwold?

Senator Buckwold: Most of my questions have been asked by Senator Frith. However, perhaps you could explain to me how Bill C-54 achieves what you already have in the legislation and which we are extending now to December 31. We have not had Bill C-54 in front of us. I want to know whether there is a direct reference in the legislation to everything that we are talking about today?

Mr. Hockin: There are consequential amendments in Bill C-54 that would take out the sunset clause that is in there. That is how the question of the deadline arises in Bill C-54. I am sorry, I cannot quote to you the exact clause because I did not bring the bill with me.

Senator Buckwold: Under Bill C-54, there would have been, as you say, clauses that would have eliminated this, in any case. Why do we need it here at all? Why do we not just have the prohibition without a sunset clause?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, Bill C-54 links new definitions to these categories and takes out the sunset clause. The reason it was necessary to act in this bill is that we have not passed Bill C-54.

Senator Buckwold: But you have not answered my question as to why, in fact, we need a sunset clause at all. If code 9956 in Schedule VII was there without a sunset clause, would there be any conflict? If not, then we would not have to worry, in case your legislation was held up even further.

Mr. Hockin: I think, Senator Buckwold, I may have misled you. Bill C-54 removes the sunset clause. Therefore, the prohibitions would continue into time until the bill was changed in the future. The sunset clause is in there now in anticipation of Bill C-54, so that it will not bump up against it. As I have said, it is in there in anticipation of Bill C-54 being passed.

● (1520)

Senator Buckwold: I can follow that, but why have a sunset clause at all in the original legislation? Every time there is a delay with Bill C-54 you will have to extend the sunset clause, and some things will not be covered.

[Senator Frith.]

Mr. Hockin: The government wanted to make it clear that it intended to bring in new legislation, and putting a sunset clause on the status quo is a way of making that point clear, and the government is making it clear again by just giving 18 months rather than three years, five years or whatever.

Senator Sinclair: How long did the original sunset clause operate?

Mr. Hockin: There have been three events; this is for 18 months, the previous was for six months, and the one prior to that was for 18 months.

Senator Sinclair: You said, Mr. Minister, that there was linkage between Bill C-54 definitions and those covered in the Criminal Code at the present time. Is that so in each of the three different areas, sedition, obscenity and hate literature? What do you mean by "linkage"?

Mr. Hockin: The only category of behaviour that is being treated in Bill C-54 is obscenity. There is discussion in the House of Commons about perhaps looking at hate propaganda, but nothing formal has been done. Bill C-54 will contain nothing about hate propaganda, treasonable literature or seditious literature.

Senator Sinclair: It is only in obscenity, is it, that there is a linkage between Bill C-54 and the existing sunset clause?

Mr. Hockin: That is right.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): My question relates to the Free Trade Agreement, which, as I understand it, is to become effective on January 1, 1989.

Let us suppose that a publisher in the United States finds that a book which he expected to sell profitably in Canada is excluded from admission to Canada under an interpretation of Schedule VII of the Customs Tariff. Let us suppose the publisher says, "No, my book is not pornographic. The Canadian government, or rather the appropriate minister, or his minion, is excluding my book from the Canadian market for ulterior reasons, perhaps because it competes with a similar Canadian book." Let us suppose that the publisher in the United States proposes to challenge the exclusion as contrary to the Free Trade Agreement. Would the Free Trade Agreement give such an American publisher any new grounds for making a challenge to the application of the Customs Tariff against the product?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I anticipated Senator Stewart's question too early, but I think the essence of the question was: How do the obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code and Bill C-54 square with the Free Trade Agreement?

A country's obscenity legislation takes precedence over GATT, and that is not viewed as being a non-tariff barrier. The Free Trade Agreement is consistent with the GATT; therefore, our obscenity provisions would remain regardless of the Free Trade Agreement.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): So, in a word, you are saying that the Free Trade Agreement in no way will cast a shadow on the legitimacy of any interpretation put on Schedule VII of the Customs Tariff by the appropriate Canadian authority.

Mr. Hockin: I cannot think of any context in which that would not be true.

Senator Flynn: If I recall correctly, the sunset clause, when it was inserted in a bill sponsored by Senator Nurgitz in 1987, which is now Chapter 49 of the Statutes of 1987, dealt only with adding the description of obscene material. The rest of the material described was already covered by the legislation and we only wanted to be able to stop obscene printed material.

Mr. Hockin: We put the sunset clause in in 1985 to indicate our resolve to bring in a new piece of legislation, but we also did a linkage between the obscenity provisions and the Criminal Code in 1985.

Senator Flynn: The linkage would be between hate literature and provisions of the Criminal Code. That, of course, is a linkage, but I think in 1987 we dealt only with obscene material.

Mr. Hockin: In 1985 all of these categories—hate propaganda, treasonable material, seditious material and obscene material—were linked.

Senator Flynn: And then what did you do? You stood them after? Is that it?

Mr. Hockin: No.

Senator Flynn: I thought you wanted to eliminate a loophole with regard to obscene material when this sunset clause was brought in.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Chairman, I will ask the official at the table to help me with this, because I think what Senator Flynn is harking back to is a court decision of 1985 that changed this, making the description of all of this somewhat convoluted.

Ms. Carol Nelder-Corvari, Tariff Officer, International Trade and Finance Branch, Department of Finance: In 1985 there was a Federal Court of Appeal ruling which declared that the description of obscenity was unconstitutional because it contravened the Charter. So at that time the government moved quickly to insert linkages to the Criminal Code in order to use the specific definitions under the Criminal Code to make it constitutional.

At that time the first sunset clause was inserted, and since that time the sunset clause has been amended on two separate occasions; but that is all that has been amended.

Senator Flynn: That is all I wanted to have on the record—that is, that at that time there was a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal which forced this amendment with regard only to the question of obscene material. I had some doubts as to the validity of that provision. Has that provision been challenged since then?

Mr. Hockin: We first had the challenge in the Keegstra case.

Senator Flynn: I know about that. We have the judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal, but I was thinking only of the obscene aspects of the materials.

Mr. Hockin: There is no challenge.

Senator Flynn: Not up until now?

Mr. Hockin: Not up until now on the obscenity parts.

Senator Flynn: But you will probably have the same problem with this situation as you are having with Bill C-54.

Mr. Hockin: Yes.

Senator Flynn: In any event, I just wanted to put it on the record.

Mr. Hockin: I should tell the senators that, with regard to the hate literature question, the ruling by the Alberta Court of Appeal will not affect the ability of the federal government to apply the prohibition. I think it is important that the Senate know this. The ruling made by the Alberta Court of Appeal will not affect the ability of the federal government to apply the prohibition on importations of hate literature on a national basis so long as we extend the authority, which we are doing today.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure about that? First of all, it is not a final judgment. It may be crushed by the Supreme Court. But, since you referred specifically to that provision of the Criminal Code which has been ruled invalid and unconstitutional, I do not see how you can say that this could be viewed this way.

Mr. Hockin: Senator Flynn, the ruling of the Alberta Court only applies to the ability of the Attorney General of that province to prosecute for the offences cited under Section 281 of the Criminal Code.

Senator Flynn: I am not worried about that aspect now, although I think you will eventually have a problem if the judgment is maintained.

Senator Frith: I have not read the judgment, but did it refer only to the authority of the Attorney General to prosecute? It did not find, in fact, that there was an infringement of Section 2(b) of the Charter?

Mr. Hockin: My understanding is that it applies only to the ability of the Attorney General of that province to prosecute for the offences that are cited under that section of the Criminal Code.

Senator Frith: So it was a procedural question rather than a matter of infringing the Charter. I am surprised, but we can look it up ourselves.

Senator Flynn: For the time being the judgment only applies in Alberta, because that is where it was rendered. That is something else. If it was maintained by the Supreme Court of Canada, of course, it would apply all across the country.

Senator Frith: But, in the meantime, if someone is charged in Ontario, I can certainly cite the Alberta Court of Appeal as a defence. It is interesting, and I agree with Senator Flynn that, if you have a problem, you will have it in another context and it will not be affected by our extension of it. I think Senator Flynn's point is that you refer to the specific section that was, I believe, the subject matter of the Alberta Court of Appeal decision; so there may be some mines down the road for you on that matter. But it does not affect whether or not we should extend it.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if there are no other senators who wish to participate, I would like to thank the minister for coming.

Shall the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill, without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Hockin: Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-135, to amend the Customs Tariff (Code 9956), has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it should be put on the record that we have abridged the time for third reading because the Deputy Leader of the Government has told us that provision has been made for Royal Assent today.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS CONTROL BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Arthur Tremblay moved the third reading of Bill C-51, an Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products.

He said: Honourable senators, I am informed that the corrections contained in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology concerning Bill C-51 have been made and that they have been given to the Clerk of the Senate, as required.

Given this development and given also that permission had been given earlier to proceed as soon as these corrections were made, I now have the honour to propose third reading of Bill C-51.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, this means that the Senate has done its homework and that the version of the bill we are about to read for the third time is correctly drafted without exception.

Senator Tremblay: Exactly. That is precisely what has been done and we are therefore justified in proceeding to third reading of a bill which is free of technical errors.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure then, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REVISED MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Consideration of the revised Message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with respect to this matter, I move:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1(b), 3, 4, 9(a) and 11 to the Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1(a), 2, 5, 6(a), 7, 8, 9(b) and (c), 10, 12(a) and (b);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 14, 18 and 29;

That the Senate agree to the further amendment made by that House, adding a new clause after line 31 on page 56; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

NON-SMOKERS' HEALTH BILL

THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the third reading of Bill C-204, an Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Tremblay just told us that Bill C-51, which we adopted, was free of technical errors.

We must now ask whether we will pass Bill C-204 with errors! That is the whole problem.

Although the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology reported it to us without amendment, this Bill has several technical defects.

It was obvious to the committee that all members of this house are in favour of protecting non-smokers' rights. The problem with this legislation is how these rights will be exercised without infringing on the legitimate rights of smokers.

Normally, in view of the observations we received from the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, the President of VIA Rail and the Department of Labour, it involves knowing whether we can simply pass this bill even if it means forcing the government to present us eventually with a new bill to correct the technical deficiencies found here.

I could perhaps have moved that the Bill not be read now for the third time but that it be again referred to the same committee or another one to try to correct all these technical errors that have been mentioned. I do not believe that it would be useful to list them again.

In any case, it can only come into force upon proclamation by the Governor in Council, as provided under Section 10:

Subject to subsection (2), this Act or any provision hereof shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation.

The government has the option of introducing amending legislation to act on the various comments that were made.

In the circumstances, I think it is rather amusing to see how at times Parliament may feel pushed by public opinion, as is the case here. These bills were on the Order Paper of the house and Senator Haidasz' bill was in committee for quite some time, and then we saw this avalanche engulf Parliament, and all of a sudden these bills had to be adopted at top speed. It seems that public opinion wants us to say right away: yes, we agree. For the record, I think it is fair to say that normally, we might have taken the time to amend Bill C-204. This often happens with Private Members' bills. It isn't easy for a Member of Parliament to draft a bill that is the least bit complex, and this one certainly is, from the practical point of view. It gets very complicated when you say that you can smoke here and you can't smoke there and that there will be sanctions in certain cases. It is all rather complex. In fact, just after reading the bill, we can imagine the problems involved in implementing this legislation. As I said before, it isn't easy for a member of Parliament to draft his own bill, even with expert assistance. He will never have the kind of expertise that is available to the government, mainly through the Department of Justice, with the assistance of the various departments that may be concerned.

So with these reservations, and if we must and I suppose we must, let the bill, errors and all, receive the final approval of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, do I have leave of the Senate to say a few words?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I simply wanted to thank Senator Flynn for once again drawing the attention of the Senate to the errors I referred to on June 21, 1988. If I understand correctly, although there are a number of problems in connection with this bill, denying the bill third reading at this time might kill the proposed legislation altogether, and that is why we agree to adopt the bill on third reading.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has referred to the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Before I make my concluding remarks, I should like to ask Senator Tremblay, the chairman of that committee, if he wishes to make a few remarks, because I was not called by the committee when it was studying Bill C-204.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I don't have any particular comments to make about the specific question Senator Haidasz is referring to. If I understood him correctly, he assumes he has not been "called" to our committee, I think that is the word you used. But we did invite you. At one point, I even suggested that you stand in for some of the other members of the committee so that you could become formally one of ours, which would have given you the opportunity to participate more fully and more directly. However, the point of the matter is, I think, that you could not make it on the day our committee was meeting. So, we had two choices: either delay the study of that bill or do it our way. The committee chose the second option with the result that the bill was returned to the Senate without amendment. I would imagine that you, as the mover, would not push your objection, due to the fact that you could not come that day to our committee's meeting, as far as to ask us to begin the study all over again. From your comments, I think that would be a farfetched conclusion to reach. But, after all, that is your business.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I only wanted to correct a statement that Senator Flynn had made. Senator Tremblay has now put the statements and the facts on the record.

This being the threshold of the passing of a very important health bill in this chamber, I should like to thank all honourable senators—including the chairman of the committee and Senator Flynn—for cooperating in expediting the study and passage of Bill C-204.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EMERGENCIES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Bill C-77, An Act to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Shall clause 40 carry?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to break your momentum. Clause 40, subclause (1), states:

While a declaration of a war emergency is in effect, the Governor in Council may make such orders or regulations as the Governor in Council believes, on reasonable grounds, are necessary or advisable for dealing with the emergency.

The record of the debate on Bill C-77 in the other House and the record of the consideration of that bill by the committee of the other House suggests that the members did not realize that they were delegating to the Governor in Council the authority to conscript Canadians to serve in the armed forces. Certainly, if they did realize that, little or nothing was said about that important delegation of power.

The Minister of National Defence, when he was before this committee, told us that clause 40 would authorize the government to introduce conscription by order in council. Honourable senators will agree that Parliament should not delegate so great a power to the Governor in Council in general and inclusive words. The minister told us that the government is not asking for the power to impose taxes by order in council; yet we are being asked to give the government the power to conscript personnel. "Send men, not money" is hardly a proposition to which senators would wish to subscribe. I hope that such a proposition would not attract the support of members in the other place.

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 40 of Bill C-77, on page 20, be amended by adding, immediately after subclause (1) thereof, the following subclause:

(1.1) The power under subsection (1) to make orders and regulations may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the Canadian Forces.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), seconded by the Honourable Senator Sinclair:

That clause 40 of Bill C-77, on page 20, be amended by adding, immediately after subclause (1) thereof, the following subclause:

(1.1) The power under subsection (1) to make orders and regulations may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the Canadian Forces.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, before you vote on the amendment, does that mean that according to this legislation—this is the first that I have heard of this—the government of the day has passed a bill that is prepared to demand, by order in council, that people put their lives at stake rather than their pocketbooks? They will not pass taxes by order in council, but they will ask them to put their lives up by order in council without an act of Parliament?

In this modern day, with airplanes, telex, telephones and Fax machines, Parliament can be convened quickly in order to pass an act of Parliament rather than conscripting people. Surely to goodness we do not need to have orders in council to have people put their lives on the line when we do not ask them for taxes by the same method.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Stewart has proposed an interesting amendment.

If the generality of the terms of clause 40 has to be limited in the way suggested, it should be limited in many other ways also. Senator Bonnell may be surprised to know that the present legislation, the present War Measures Act, says exactly the same thing, and yet it has never been used to apply conscription; it has never been used to impose a tax; it has never been used in this way.

I suspect that if any government were to try to take away the discretion of Parliament in these important matters—other than those attempts or experiments in the previous two world wars—Parliament would certainly step in, as it has the right to do because there is a control by Parliament over these decisions. The government has to report to Parliament, and Parliament may intervene, as is provided in some clauses later on.

If we are to give to the terms of clause 40 the meaning suggested by Senator Stewart, we will have to go much further and say that that does not include the power to tax—or the power to do a few other things that do not come to mind at this point.

I do not know if he really wants this amendment to be voted on; if he merely wants to draw the attention of the house to the wide implications of the text of subclause (1) of clause 40, I agree with him. However, if we are to limit this text, we will have to consider many situations other than this one. I certainly would not be prepared to support his amendment without also supporting a host of other amendments that would have to be considered.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has just given the best of reasons for supporting Senator Stewart's amendment. He said two things:—

Senator Flynn: That is your view, but possibly someone else has something to say.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I could have a few quiet minutes in which to express my views; after all, we granted you the courtesy of silence.

● (1610)

In any event, it seems to me that Senator Flynn has indicated that, while that authority was there, in fact, under the War Measures Act—

Senator Flynn: There is no question. It was there!

Senator Olson: No one is disagreeing with you, but what Senator Stewart said was that it was never used during those two wars. When conscription was asked for, the Prime Minister of the day came to Parliament and sought authority from Parliament to invoke it, whether or not he had authority under the War Measures Act to do so. I am not arguing whether or not he did it; I am just assuming that the government had the authority to do so through the Governor in Council.

Senator Flynn: What I suggested was that, if it was not done, it was because they did not think that they were allowed to do it.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, there may also have been a couple of other reasons, but, in any event, the point that I am making is that we went through two world wars and approximately 70 years with this provision in the War Measures Act. If it was not used even under the most severe conditions in all of that time, then we should not put it back into law now. If the government intends to impose conscription, as Senator Bonnell has pointed out, and to force people by law to join the armed forces, then surely we should make it a statutory requirement that the government must come and ask Parliament for that authority.

Therefore, in my view, that is the very best reason for supporting the amendment that has been moved by Senator Stewart.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, what Senator Flynn has said is probably 100 per cent right; Mackenzie King, in his time, went before Parliament to ask for conscription and would have been given permission by order in council. Of course, in those days we did not have airplanes and other such quick methods to call Parliament together. However, this is 1988. Let us not go back to the old days by giving to a few people the power to conscript our young men and women and ask them to put their lives on the line, when this matter can be dealt with by a Parliament which can now be called together within two days. The members of both houses can be present here in Parliament to consider the matter and Royal Assent can be given, all in one day. But at least the representatives of the people of this country would have an opportunity to have their say.

Imagine a scenario in which the government of the day has the authority to put through an order in council to send our boys and girls overseas to fight in a war. Then, a month later, Parliament is called back and rejects that order in council. What happens then? Must we then bring everyone home again?

Honourable senators, this is 1988; let us be practical about these matters. Surely it should not be left to the whim of a few people in cabinet to make that immediate decision to conscript our Canadian boys and girls into the armed forces without giving the representatives of the people of this country the opportunity to be heard and to speak on their behalf.

Senator Flynn: I do not want anyone to believe that I agree with the interpretation put on this clause by Senator Stewart. However, I was sufficiently reminded of the experience during the two world wars to say that, in fact, I would never interpret the text in the way that this amendment would suggest it could be interpreted.

There is also, of course, a big difference in this legislation that has to be underlined, and that is that we now have the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which is applicable to the powers granted to the government and restricts the powers given to the government.

Again, if you say that we must restrict these powers, I think the Senate will have to consider many other areas where it would be as sensible to restrict these powers. If that is absolutely what you want, that would be an entirely new exercise than the one proposed by Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): No, Mr. Chairman. I think Senator Flynn is correct in asserting that the power that would be delegated by clause 40 is similar to the power delegated in the War Measures Act. There is no real change in the power delegated.

However, Senator Flynn says that he disagrees with my interpretation. I must tell him that I am not relying on my own interpretation. When I spoke at second reading I quoted what the Prime Minister of the day in 1942 and 1944 said, and earlier today I quoted what the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Beatty, said on May 31, 1988. Honourable senators, on this very point, Mr. Beatty said:

With regard to conscription, our advice is that this would be legally possible by order in council under Part IV of Bill C-77.

That is Mr. Beatty's interpretation, and I think his interpretation is correct. I do not know why Senator Flynn has problems with accepting the interpretation given by the Minister of National Defence.

We then come to the other question: If Parliament, in fact, does delegate this power anew, will it be used? Honourable senators, that is a matter of speculation. Surely we ought not to grant this power simply on the basis that it might not be used. As a matter of fact, although it was not used in World War I, we must recall that the War Measures Act was used to change the provisions with regard to exemptions from military service. Also, during World War II, in the fall of 1944 it was used as one of the two bases for sending some 16,000 Canadians overseas. Thus we see that, although the government of the day felt that for political and not legal reasons it should not use the power that had been delegated to it under the War Measures Act, it did use those powers in closely related situations.

In any case, honourable senators, what I am saying is that the House of Commons did not confront this question. They did not say in express words that they wished to delegate to the Governor in Council the power to introduce conscription. One of the functions of my amendment will be to allow the House of Commons to decide, and declare overtly, whether they wish to delegate to the Governor in Council the power to introduce conscription.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word on this point. I must admit it is a matter I have not heard discussed in detail—as to the effect of the large powers conferred by clause 40 which we are now discussing. It strikes me that there are a good many other powers besides the one we are discussing that would probably need to be considered, as Senator Flynn has suggested, if we decided that we were going to modify the powers in this clause.

It seems to me, however, that we have overlooked the fact that these powers are not absolute. The impression I have received from the discussion so far is that these powers are absolute. Honourable senators, I do not think they are, because there is a provision in this bill for parliamentary supervision. In other words, within a short time—I think it is seven days after the declaration of a war emergency—Parliament must be convened to deal with the matter. Surely, if there has been any excess of zeal or excess of authority, or even ill-advised policy on the part of the government at the moment the emergency is declared and measures are taken unto it, the Parliament has an opportunity—and in fact a duty—within a very short period of time to confirm or not to confirm the actions taken by the executive in respect of this matter.

I have to advise the committee at once that I do not pose as an expert on this bill. It may be that I have misinterpreted it. I do not think I have, but it is quite possible I have not given it a correct reading. However, if I have given it a correct reading, it makes me feel a lot better, because it means that the unauthorized or the extra-parliamentary activities of the executive are not free. There is a constraint upon them, and that constraint is the right and duty of Parliament to supervise what is being done.

This bill specifically states—and I think it is a distinct improvement over what we had before—that if a state of emergency is declared then the provision for Parliament to exercise its role as the arbiter of policy in the nation is clearly set out within what I think is a reasonable space of time. So I do not feel so bad about the fact that the clause is sweeping in its mandate. In fact, it seems to me that such a proposal is probably appropriate, particularly if you have this restraint of parliamentary supervision that is provided.

● (1620)

If any government was so ill-advised as to tax somebody, as I think they could under this section, or so ill-advised as to conscript somebody, as I think they could do under this section, they would not be immune from parliamentary supervision or from parliamentary approval or disapproval of what they had done—and that in short order; it is not a lengthy period of time. So I would be reluctant to upset the wording of this legislation on the argument we have received.

While in theory the power of the Crown may be as set out here—indeed, as it has been in all legislation of this type that I am aware of, first, that does not mean that the Crown will automatically do these things, and, second, even if the Crown were so ill-advised as to use this clause to justify a policy of the kind I am talking about here, Parliament would have its say. That is the sanction that really counts. So it seems to me that, while the point is interesting, it is not one we should accept without further consideration at this moment.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the points raised by Senators Flynn and Roblin are well taken, and I think it is important that they were raised. I part company with them only on using those points to support resistance to the adoption of this amendment. On Senator Flynn's point, there may very well be other areas that would merit amendment, but that does not diminish my support for this one. As to the point raised by Senator Roblin, he is right that this bill does not throw parliamentary review out the window. The difficulty is that parliamentary review only applies after the fact. In the context of political reality, there is quite a difference between requiring the executive, no matter which party may dominate it, to go to Parliament and ask it to do something as important as has been described and requiring the executive to go to Parliament to ask for its imprimatur after the act is done.

For those reasons I do not cross swords with Senators Flynn and Roblin on the points they have raised, but I argue that they do not diminish my support for this amendment. I think we should carry it anyway.

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, I cannot really see the force of my friend's argument that to ask for approval after the fact is different from having to initiate it in the first place. The fact is Parliament will debate the issue, if it wishes to, under either circumstance, and Parliament will get its way under either circumstance. I feel comfortable with that view of parliamentary procedure and, while not having had to exercise such responsibility in the federal legislature, I recognize the weight that rests on the executive to get approval of this measure. Whether it seeks that approval through a review procedure or in advance, it will be the same tough proposition and will have to be well substantiated to be accepted by the people of the nation.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I did not express my point very well. Let me express it in this way: To me there is a great difference between saying to someone, "Come and convince me that I should do something" and coming to me and saying, "Please convince me why I should not have done it." The burden is quite different.

Senator Roblin: But you do not have to convince just anybody; you have to convince members of Parliament.

Senator Frith: If we pass this amendment, it will put the government in the position that they are normally in; namely, that of having to go to Parliament and say, "This is what we propose, and we ask for your support." If they go to Parliament after the fact, then they say, "We've done it. Now, you review it and tell us why we shouldn't have." There is a big difference.

Senator Roblin: You still have to convince the individual members of Parliament that it is a good thing.

Senator Flynn: They could expropriate and do all sorts of things that are not contemplated.

Senator Lang: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the other opinions, I think this discussion is quite academic. In fact, if any executive or cabinet brought in conscription without prior parliamentary consent, it would be doing so under circumstances when our parliamentary institutions had disappeared either through internal revolution or through an external atomic attack, say, on Ottawa. Therefore, I am not concerned about this problem. In fact, if honourable senators look at the history of Germany, they will see that the absolute power of the Nazis was accomplished with prior Reichstag approval. In our system of government, nothing like a unilateral declaration by the cabinet proposing conscription could possibly come about unless our parliamentary institutions had been completely disabled.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Roblin would clarify for me a point he just made. I believe he stated that Parliament would have to ratify such a decision within seven days. I am looking at clause 58 and, as I read it, it applies only upon the declaration of a war emergency. Unless I have missed the pertinent part, it does not apply to any order made under the war emergency.

Senator Roblin: I take a broad view of the expression "war emergency". I take the expression to mean what is being done under that particular heading. If a war emergency was declared and conscription was involved, to suggest that Parliament would meet without discussing the issue, I think, is unrealistic.

Senator Neiman: I quite agree, but I would think that the only requirement is to ratify the declaration of war emergency. Parliament may very well choose to do so, but the Governor in Council is then no longer required, at least as I read the legislation, to consult with respect to any order made once that declaration has been ratified.

Senator Roblin: Without being able to put my finger on the exact clause, certain other portions of this bill refer to parliamentary supervision and it may be that they are relevant to this issue; I really cannot say. I take the view, however, that anything done under war emergencies legislation would certainly be grist to the parliamentary mill when it was asked to approve these items. And to think for one moment that, for example, taxation by order in council or conscription by order in council would escape the scrutiny of Parliament in that connection seems to me to be unrealistic. I guess the only case where it would not be unrealistic would be the case described by Senator Lang, who says, "Well, if our parliamentary institutions are not here..." If they are not here, there is nothing here.

● (1630)

Senator Neiman: I agree with Senator Roblin's observations, but for greater certainty why should we not adopt this type of amendment?

Senator Roblin: I have given my reasons for that.

Senator Frith: I do not think we are now going to persuade each other. To me, the argument comes down to saying that they probably will not do it; it is unrealistic to think they will do it, therefore, we might as well let them have the power to do it. That is only my opinion. It is not the opinion of Senator Roblin and it is not the opinion of Senator Flynn. I think our different views have been expressed and that the question should be put.

Senator Roblin: I would not like Senator Frith's interpretation of my views to stand, because that is not my interpretation. I do not think one should pass a law because no one is going to use it. One always has to assume that it will be used; otherwise why pass the law? Then one has to look at the fail-safe mechanism, and the fail-safe mechanism here is that, if they do something damn silly—if I might use that unparliamentary adjective—we have the supervisory power of Parliament to put things right, and I rely on that.

Senator Hicks: There is one point which perhaps Senators Roblin and Neiman might take into consideration, and in a sense it supports the position that each of them has taken.

[Senator Frith.]

The review provided under clause 58 does, indeed, apply to the declaration of the war emergency only, but the war emergency could be declared in January, let us say, and would be in effect for a stipulated time. Then, in the June following, the actions of the executive to impose conscription could be taken. The review envisaged by clause 58 of the declaration of the war emergency would not apply to that.

I also have to agree with Senator Roblin that it is inconceivable that Parliament would not have, and would not seize, the opportunity to review, comment upon and, if necessary, revise the executive action that displeased them.

The Chairman: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

The Chairman: We will have to have a division, in that case. The division provides for senators to stand and be counted. Once that begins, there can be no further entry into the chamber. I will now call for the vote and there will be no further entry into the chamber.

Honourable senators, those in favour of the motion in amendment please stand.

Those opposed to the amendment please stand.

Yeas: 25; Nays: 14.

I declare the motion in amendment carried.

Shall clause 40, as amended, carry?

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I move that the clause be further amended by adding right after the last amendment just adopted "... nor for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost."

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, that clause 40 of Bill C-77, page 20, be further amended by adding immediately after subclause (1.1) the following words: "... nor for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost."

Senator Olson: May we have an explanation? Does this mean the government may not use any of the moneys in the treasury for any of these purposes?

Senator Flynn: If you want to restrict the powers with respect to conscription, you may as well restrict them for these and any other purposes that may come to mind eventually.

Senator Frith: That is not part of the formal amendment: "... any others that may come to mind"?

Senator Olson: I do not have a copy of the proposed amendment in front of me, but I hope I misunderstand what Senator Flynn's intentions are.

Senator Flynn: For Senator Olson's benefit I will say this: Since the Senate has decided that it should restrict the powers provided in section 40, I want it to go further. If an amendment is necessary to deal with the problem of conscription, one should also be necessary to prevent the Governor in Council from appropriating any part of the public revenue or imposing any tax or impost by order in council, in the same way that you say conscription could be imposed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was prepared to support Senator Flynn's amendment if it was only to deal with the imposition of taxes by Governor in Council, but the wording—and I do not have it in front of me—seems to imply that the Governor in Council would not have the authority to use the revenue from whatever taxation already exists for the pursuit of some of these measures.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: That is what he appears to say.

Senator Hicks: Perhaps it should be read again.

Senator Flynn: Section 53 of the British North America Act, 1867 states:

Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

This is a privilege of the House and it is also a privilege of Parliament.

What I am saying is, if you cannot use the wide powers provided in clause 40, I do not want the government to use these powers to avoid presenting Parliament with appropriation bills or with bills for imposing any tax or impost. If we have to restrict the powers of the government, I want to be clear that this does not grant the government these powers.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am having difficulty, because Senator Flynn says he does not want the government to use an emergency for the purpose of presenting an appropriation bill even to Parliament.

Senator Flynn: No, no, no!

Senator Olson: That is ridiculous.

Senator Flynn: Read clause 40.

The Chairman: It is proposed that the following words be added to the amendment we have already passed:

"... nor for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost."

Senator Flynn: How would the whole subclause read?

The Chairman: The new clause would read:

"... to make orders and regulations may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the Canadian Forces nor for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost."

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, there is much about Senator Flynn's proposed amendment that is highly attractive; however, I want to make two comments about his amendment.

We know that it is impossible for a government to appropriate by order in council—that is a parliamentary function.

However, we were told by the spokesmen of the government that they already have the power to withdraw money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund by Governor General's warrants. That is not appropriation. Therefore, as long as that provision remains there, the first part of Senator Flynn's proposed amendment does not accomplish anything. The government already can withdraw money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund under the provisions of another statute.

• (1640)

Senator Flynn: Sure, sure, but under the other statute; under this clause they would not.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is correct. They said that they did not interpret this bill as conferring upon them the power to appropriate, and that they did not need to acquire new power because they already had power to obtain money under another statute.

Senator Flynn: In certain circumstances.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is what they said in regard to my question on appropriation.

Now we come to the other point, namely, the imposition of a tax or impost. Senator Flynn here is disagreeing with the government. On May 31, at page 3531 of Hansard, the minister said:

Finally, with regard to taxation, I am pleased to say that I can give a short, unequivocal answer. Taxes cannot be imposed by order in council. The Constitution sets out quite specific procedures for levying taxes and a bill is always required.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Consequently, the second part of Senator Flynn's proposed amendment runs contrary to the government's interpretation of the Constitution and, therefore, would seem to accomplish nothing. The minister is saying, "Even if we ask for this power, you could not give it to us, because this cannot be delegated." Consequently, to reduce the delegation in the way proposed by Senator Flynn, according to the minister, would be to reduce a delegation which had not been made in the first place. Therefore, from the viewpoint of the government, Senator Flynn's proposed amendment really would accomplish nothing.

The Chairman: Is there anything further?

Senator Flynn: I wanted you to change your mind, but you do not when it does not meet your purposes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Senator Flynn, I happen to think that the minister probably is wrong and that you are right. All I am saying is that you are proposing—I suppose with the support of government senators—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): —an amendment which is contrary to the interpretation set forth by the minister speaking for the government.

[Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

The Chairman: Is it your wish, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: The further one, no.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: I have not heard any "yeas".

Senator Flynn: Yea.

Senator Frith: Atta boy, Jacques! Not so fast!

The Chairman: In that case, shall we have a division by the same process?

Senator Roblin: You can call the result, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: You are satisfied that I call the result? In my opinion, then, the amendment does not carry. Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: All right, shall clause 40, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 41 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 42 carry?

The Chairman: Shall clause 59 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 60 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 61 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 62?

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Clause 62 provides for a Parliamentary Review Committee, the purpose of which is to examine what we might call secret orders in council, those which, in the national interest, would not be made public. This Parliamentary Review Committee is to be a committee of both houses of Parliament.

● (1650)

The clause, as it now reads, states:

The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in the House of Commons.

There is no provision for party representation from the Senate.

Here is what might happen: Let us say that we had a Liberal government—

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): That was the situation during the Second World War. Let us say a joint committee was to be set up. The joint committee would have to have at least one senator on it for it to be a joint committee. However, the Liberal majority in the Senate might well say, "That one senator will be a Liberal senator," with the result that there would be no Progressive Conservative senator on the joint committee. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be proper to eliminate that possibility by an amendment. Consequently, I move:

That clause 62 of Bill C-77, on page 32, be amended by striking out lines 3 to 7 and substituting the following:

(2) The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member of the House of Commons from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in that House and at least one senator from each party in the Senate that is represented on the committee by a member of the House of Commons.

The effect would be that a joint committee set up with the present Senate would have at least one Progressive Conservative senator on it and at least one Liberal senator on it.

Let us say that we had in the Senate one member of the New Democratic Party. The Parliamentary Review Committee would have one member from the New Democratic Party from the House of Commons and one senator from the New Democratic Party. That senator would be eligible to sit on that committee as a representative of the Senate.

If, however, we had senators from parties that did not have at least 12 members in the House of Commons, those senators would not be eligible to sit on that committee.

The amendment is drawn so as to produce a balance between the representation of the parties in the House of Commons and the Senate on the Parliamentary Review Committee. I have reason to believe that this amendment might be acceptable to the government.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden:

That clause 62 of Bill C-77, on page 32, be amended by striking out lines 3 to 7 and substituting the following:

(2) The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member of the House of Commons from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in that House and at least one senator from each party in the Senate that is represented on the committee by a member of the House of Commons.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Barootes: Mr. Chairman, the way Senator Stewart's amendment reads, if the New Democratic Party has no representatives in the Senate, bearing in mind that last line, we are in a bit of trouble, are we not, in assuming that every party in the House of Commons shall have a representative in the Senate? That is the way I read it.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): It says "at least one senator from each party in the Senate", but that provision is limited by the words, "that is represented on the committee by a member of the House of Commons." It does not say that each party that is represented on the committee from the House of Commons shall be represented by a senator.

The Chairman: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 62, as amended, carry?

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill, as amended?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate with two amendments.

A Clerk at the Table: The first amendment reads as follows:

That clause 40 of Bill C-77, on page 20, be amended by adding, immediately after subclause (1) thereof, the following subclause:

(1.1) The power under subsection (1) to make orders and regulations may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the Canadian Forces."

[Translation]

The second amendment reads as follows:

That clause 62 of Bill C-77, on page 32, be amended by striking out lines 3 to 7 and substituting the following:

"(2) The Parliamentary Review Committee shall include at least one member of the House of Commons from each party that has a recognized membership of twelve or more persons in that House and at least one senator from each party in the Senate that is represented on the committee by a member of the House of Commons."

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this time we are abridging the one day's notice requirement, but for another reason—because there is a chance that without other work for the Senate itself, apart from the committees, the Senate might not sit the rest of this week. So why not send it back to the House of Commons while we are not sitting?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that this bill, as amended, be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the rules of the Senate, I would ask, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate is still sitting, that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee be empowered to meet now.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no problem with that, honourable senators, provided we have a quorum for Royal Assent at 5:30 this afternoon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And that we can call on the members of the committee, if necessary, to be present.

Hon. Duff Roblin: As a member of the committee, I rather deprecate the fact that we are to meet when we should be here to lend our artistic verisimilitude to the ceremony of Royal Assent. I am going to be right here.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, of course I am thoughtful of the views expressed so many times on the other side of the need to move forward expeditiously on matters that come before Senate committees. It is because of that and because of the input that I know honourable senators give, and in view of the time, that I suggest that we meet now so that their input will be available and they will not be rushing off to supper just when we want their input. Therefore, I ask honourable senators to give us the opportunity to meet now to consider the future work of the committee, and we will try to rush senators back if they feel that they have to be here.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend wants to breach the rules of the Senate to do so. I do not think that is a good idea.

Senator Sinclair: If he does not want to expedite government business, and that is the position of the honourable senator, I guess we can take that into account. This is the second time. One other time, honourable senators, we were accused of giving only cursory attention to an important piece of legislation by a minister, supported by a member of the other side. Now we have another view. In light of that, we can use that at another time. If I cannot get consent, I cannot get consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I gather that leave is not granted, honourable senators?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not going to deny leave. That is not what I said and not what I intended, but I object to the proceeding.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I gather, subject to Senator Roblin's reservations, that leave is granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1987

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Michel Cogger moved the second reading of Bill C-131, to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, I know that you have been waiting all afternoon to hear what I have to say about this bill. I will not take up too much of your time and I beg your patience. You can keep in mind that Her Majesty's representative will be here shortly, with all that that entails, and it may be some form of compensation for your patience.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to speak this afternoon to Bill C-131, which provides the means for ensuring that Canadians with disabilities are provided fair and dignified access to our national transportation system.

Bill C-131, an Act to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987, will give the National Transportation Agency the power to regulate accessibility for disabled persons to all transportation services and facilities under federal jurisdiction.

This will expand on a power that the agency now has to regulate accessibility for the carriage of disabled persons on airlines.

As a result of the amendments, the agency will be able to prescribe regulations for the purpose of eliminating undue obstacles in transportation to the mobility of disabled persons. By regulation, the agency will be able to establish standards:

First, for the design, construction, and modification of means of transportation and related facilities, premises and equipment;

Second, respecting the use of signs;

Third, for the training of staff;

Fourth, respecting terms and conditions for carrying disabled persons;

And finally, respecting the communication of information to disabled persons.

The amendments will make any infringement of the standards or regulations an offence.

I would also point out that the amendments will require the National Transportation Agency and the Canadian Human Rights Commission to co-ordinate their activities in relation to the transportation of disabled persons. Both these agencies have been consulted on these amendments.

Improved access to our national transportation network will provide disabled persons with broader access to housing, education and employment and generally provide a better quality of life for a larger number of Canadians.

The views of the disabled were considered when these amendments were drafted. The disabled expressed those views when they appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications when it reviewed Bill C-18 and also when they were asked to make representations to John Crosbie, then Minister of Transport and Monique Vézina, the Minister of State for Transport at the time. Their expectations were made known through the Minister's advisory committee, that is, the Transportation of Disabled Persons Implementation Committee. The amendments contained in Bill C-131 seem to respond to at least part of their expectations.

The airlines, the railways and bus companies were consulted by the Transportation of Disabled Persons Committee.

Finally, honourable senators, I would urge you to approve this bill as quickly as possible. When it comes into force, it will provide the framework for a policy on standards for transportation services and facilities accessible to all disabled Canadians.

● (1710)

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, Senator Cogger has described very well the effect of this bill, and I would like to thank him for providing to me extensive background material on it. I checked with the various organizations with which the government has consulted—COPO, ARCH and PUSH—and, indeed, with Ms. Eileen Barbeau, who is with Services for the Disabled at the University of Toronto. They have all agreed that this bill should go through as soon as possible—a view that we on this side also take.

The enormity of the problems faced by people with disabilities in this country is known, I hope, to all honourable senators. I think the statistical evidence on the circumstances of people with disabilities, young and old, is only now becoming known, especially for those people who are not institutionalized. Certainly, this evidence came to the attention of the Special Senate Committee on Youth when students from the City of Ottawa told us that they could not get to their classes on time because public transportation ran too late in the mornings to be of any help to them. This bill will help, in part, to redress that situation, and therefore we are in favour of it.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to describe at length all of the consequences for Canadians with disabilities, but I should like to draw to the attention of the Senate an article by Rick Csiernik from the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District, which appeared in the March-April, 1988 issue of the Canadian Journal of Public Health, in which he has analyzed the problems faced by non-institutionalized disabled adults and the social services available—or, more often, not available—to them. I recommend it to senators; it says everything much more clearly than I could.

This bill is clearly a small, positive move in the right direction to help people in these circumstances. I have only one comment to make, in addition to those which Senator Cogger has made, and that is this: This bill refers to the National Transportation Agency, established through Bill C-18, which passed the House of Commons a year ago. There are nine members of the agency, one appointed from each region of Canada, and I am told that among those nine there is not one, single person with a disability or close to an organization for people with disabilities. I should like the government to consider section 8 of that act, which allows the government to add temporary members—no more than six—to the agency. I ask the government to consider appointing such temporary members from among people with disabilities, who make the case very compellingly, in my view, that they have direct experience and knowledge that is not widely known or shared. From that experience and knowledge the National Transportation Agency, which has taken up this issue as one of its major concerns, could benefit greatly.

Honourable senators, we support the second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cogger, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator McElman, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to say on this bill. If Senator Bosa wishes to proceed with it, he can by all means do so.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bosa speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I just want to make a few brief remarks in response to some comments made by Senator Hicks and Senator Gigantès during the debate on second reading. Senator Hicks said, most emphatically at page 3688 of the Debates of the Senate of June 16, 1988:

... I do not believe in a policy of multiculturalism.

Later on, he went on to say:

I think that people who have elected to come here from many other parts of the world should want to be Canadians. Certainly, their background and heritage will have something to do with and enhance the contributions they make to Canada.

Senator Gigantès, on the next page, is reported to have said:

To exist, culture has to have freedom to mingle, and one of the most wonderful things about Canada is the freedom for various cultures to mingle. When asked, I say to Greek groups that I personally am opposed to multiculturalism. I have taken this conviction so far as not to teach my children Greek. I want them to know French and English and, if they have time, to learn other languages of their choice, but while they are small and I am responsible for their education I want them to know the two main cultures and languages of Canada.

● (1720)

Honourable senators, there are many misconceptions and misunderstandings about the policy of multiculturalism. The policy of multiculturalism was announced by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau on November 6, 1971, in the House of Commons, and it was in response to a recommendation that had been made in the fourth report of the Bilingual and Bicultural Commission tabled in the other place in 1968.

Thousands of people have been developing and promoting the policy of multiculturalism. It is obvious we have not done a very thorough job, because there are millions of Canadians who do not understand the policy of multiculturalism.

To take this concept one step further, perhaps some people have a vision of Canada in which multiculturalism does not tally with what they would like Canada to be. To recognize that the composition of Canadian society is made up of a multitude of minority groups and ethnic groups is to recognize a reality. Canada is not a homogeneous society and Canada does not have an official culture.

The policy of multiculturalism gives equal status to all cultures. All individuals who understand this policy have a feeling of comfort that they are part of Canadian society. It is this feeling of equality that enables millions of Canadians, notwithstanding what some people say, to shout with pride and conviction, "I am a Canadian." This is the basic concept and object of the policy of multiculturalism.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bosa, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

28 June 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gerald Eric Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 28th day of June, 1988, at 5.25 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy and Program

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as far as I know, all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations respecting statutory instruments made by certain statutory courts.

(For text of report, see Appendix "C", p. 3788.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to talk about next week's business. When the Senate adjourns today, it is our intention that it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, July 5, 1988. At that time we expect that some legislation will be here from the other place.

I should say at this point that we do have a number of committee meetings scheduled for this week which will not be cancelled or postponed. The Internal Economy Committee will meet on Thursday morning; the Finance Committee is considering the ACOA bill on Thursday morning; the Transport Committee is meeting at least once this week to deal with Bill C-105, and another bill has now been referred to it as well. There are undoubtedly other committees which I do not know about at the moment.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g) I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, July 5, 1988, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1730)

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gerald Eric Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Acting Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products (Bill C-51, Chapter 20, 1988).

An Act to regulate smoking in the federal workplace and on common carriers and to amend the Hazardous Products Act in relation to cigarette advertising (Bill C-204, Chapter 21, 1988).

An act respecting the protection of the environment and of human life and health (Bill C-74, Chapter 22, 1988).

An Act to amend the Indian Act (designated lands) (Bill C-115, Chapter 23, 1988).

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff (code 9956) (Bill C-135, Chapter 24, 1988).

The Honourable Steven Paproski, Acting Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the Government to defray certain expenses of the public service:

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1989 (Bill C-138, Chapter 25, 1988).

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 5, 1988, at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MARGARET THATCHER

Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

to

Both Houses of Parliament

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Wednesday, June 22, 1988

ADDRESS

of

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MARGARET THATCHER

Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

to

Both Houses of Parliament

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Wednesday, June 22, 1988

The Prime Minister was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House, chers collègues, chers amis:

Today we welcome to our midst the Prime Minister of one of our mother countries, the Leader of the Mother of Parliaments and a truly outstanding spokesperson for the western world—the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher, Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We salute you, Prime Minister, as you can see, as warmly as we welcome you. The mother country has bequeathed to us an enduring tradition of British common law and our valued British cultural heritage. The Mother of Parliaments is the foundation upon which we have built our own parliamentary democracy here in Canada. We have adopted or adapted most of the customs of Westminster in the daily life of our own Parliament, with a few notable exceptions.

At Westminster, the Prime Minister is expected to attend Question Time twice a week, and the questions are submitted in advance, in writing.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: As I have always said, Prime Minister, there is much to be admired in British parliamentary democracy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —and I hope that we can initiate such a reform here in Canada, perhaps as early as this afternoon.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Prime Minister, you are no stranger to this House, having addressed a joint session five years ago. Today, you become the first British Prime Minister to address Parliament on two occasions. Historians will note that your first address followed your re-election in 1983 and that your second follows your re-election in 1987. If you, in that memorable turn of phrase, “go on and on”, we expect to see you back here about 1992.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: As the senior statesperson of the western world, Mrs. Thatcher commands respect everywhere for her strength of character, force of ideas, and of course political durability.

[Translation]

She is the first British Prime Minister to win three consecutive mandates in a century and a half and, believe me, Prime Minister, that is something everyone in this Chamber understands, respects and envies.

By the end of her present term, she will have governed Britain in three decades, the 70s, the 80s and the 90s.

● (1110)

[English]

Mrs. Thatcher has personally presided over the transformation of Britain from a nation that lagged to a nation that leads.

Britain is back as a world economic power, as a motor of economic growth, as a model of economic development, and every person in this country and in this House knows that the responsibility for that magnificent achievement is here in the person of Margaret Thatcher.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: On the world scene, I can testify first hand to her strong and persuasive leadership. She has just come from Toronto and her tenth Economic Summit. At Toronto, we sought to return to some of the informality and spontaneity of earlier summits. To the extent that we were able to do so, and to keep the focus primarily on economic issues, Margaret Thatcher played a genuinely impressive role, and I thank her for that.

The Prime Minister has also struck a balance between a determination to provide for security and a deep yearning for peace.

As you said, Prime Minister, in your previous address to this House, “our desire for disarmament is profound, but it is matched by an unshakable resolve that our way of life shall be secure”.

In NATO, she has stood at all times for the solidarity of the alliance and has strengthened her nation's contribution to the collective security of the West.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: But equally, Mrs. Thatcher was the first western leader to recognize the possibilities of change and reform in the Soviet Union. It was she, even before the change of course in the Soviet Union, who pointed out that Mr. Gorbachev was "a man we can do business with".

Between Canada and the United Kingdom there is, of course, a special relationship. The ties that bind us stretch across an ocean and reach across the generations.

The United Kingdom is now our third largest trading partner, with two-way trade in excess of $7 billion last year. Canadian exports to the U.K. rose by 5 per cent last year to $2.8 billion, representing nearly one-third of all of our exports to the European Community. Canada, with less than 1 per cent of the world's population, accounts for nearly 5 per cent of the world's trade.

[Translation]

Not surprisingly then, we are ardent proponents of trade liberalization.

As you know, Prime Minister, we have concluded a free trade agreement between Canada and the United States, the world's two largest trading partners, which we believe will give powerful impetus to the multilateral talks now under way in Geneva.

[English]

We are working very hard, and Mrs. Thatcher is providing great leadership, for reform in the area of agricultural subsidies. I am pleased with the clear signal of will which emerges from our deliberations in Toronto on this vital topic.

Of course, we maintain our familial and our very affectionate ties with Britain through the Commonwealth, and we strengthen them through the other multilateral institutions to which we bring a common heritage and in which we make common cause.

Prime Minister, we admire you as one of the world's most inspiring leaders. Your career has been one of confronting great challenge and difficulty and emerging with skill and resolve on a new plateau of accomplishment. You have stood firmly for freedom. You have fought hard for democracy. You have earned our genuine respect.

Colleagues, chers amis, I present to you a true friend of Canada, The Prime Minister of Great Britain, The Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Margaret Thatcher (Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker, Prime Minister, honourable members of the Senate, members of the House of Commons:

[Translation]

First of all I would like to thank you for the great privilege and honour of being invited to speak before you a second time. Longevity has its advantages—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Margaret Thatcher: I also want to take this opportunity to thank you and the Canadian people for the truly exceptional welcome extended to me and to the many foreign visitors who have come to your country in the past twelve months.

[English]

It has indeed been an extraordinary year in which world leaders, sportsmen, businessmen, and many others have flocked to Canada—the Francophone Summit, the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting, the Economic Summit, and the Winter Olympics. The British team may not have returned with any gold medals, but I think we can claim to have been represented by the most famous competitor.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: All this is a tribute to Canada's success and to the high regard in which your country is held world-wide and most especially within the Commonwealth.

A Canadian Prime Minister at the turn of the century predicted that "the 20th century would be the century of Canada". The last 12 months have certainly shown his prophecy to be true.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: I should like to pay a particular tribute to the skilful and creative chairmanship of those meetings by your Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, most recently at the highly successful Economic Summit. Few have the privilege of feeling that they have moved the world's fortunes a step forward. He has done so and deserves our thanks and congratulations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, our two countries are metaphorically, and often literally, members of the same family. Like a family, we have experiences in common that go back to our beginnings. A Canadian rode at Balaclava in the charge of the Light Brigade. Canadian boatmen ferried British soldiers down the Nile in their attempt to rescue General Gordon at Khartoum a century ago. It was an engineer from Québec, Sir Percy Girouard, who built the railway that was so valuable in opening up the Sudan.

Above all, we remember together our war dead by wearing poppies every November because a Canadian soldier, Major John McCrae, wrote the poem In Flanders Fields in the early morning of the 3rd of May, 1915, while the first battle of Ypres was raging.

Forty-three years after VE Day, we honour the valour and sacrifice of Canadian fighting men in two world wars. That is something which we in Britain will never forget, a debt that can never be repaid. So too is the enormously generous help which you gave Britain in the post-war years.

Four Canadian Prime Ministers, including Sir John A. Macdonald, were born in Britain, and the only British Prime Minister born overseas came from New Brunswick.

We are delighted that today Canada's involvement in our national life is as strong as ever. There are no less than 160 Canadian firms active in the United Kingdom, with nine banks and thirteen security houses. Individual Canadians—Paul Reichmann, Conrad Black, Graham Day—are making a great contribution. Most exciting of all is the major Canadian investment in Canary Wharf, the remarkable architectural and commercial renaissance of London's docklands.

Last month, I opened the construction phase myself by sinking the first concrete pile—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Thatcher: —with a little help from a pile-driver.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Thatcher: When it is complete, it will be the largest commercial development in Europe. We welcome the confidence and the commitment on the part of Canadian enterprise which it represents.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker, one of the advantages of being among family is that we can compare ailments. Some years ago, we in Britain invented a disease. Its symptoms were a combination of stagnation, inflation, financial problems, labour troubles, and loss of confidence. They called it "the British disease".

A Canadian commentator, Goldwin Smith, provided an excellent clinical definition of the malady nearly a hundred years ago. He spoke of countries that were "rich by nature, poor by policy". Today, many of us in the developed world realize that in varying degrees we have quite needlessly been "poor by policy".

We have come a long way since the days when people thought that you could spend and borrow your way to prosperity, that you needed a budget deficit and a bit of inflation to get economic growth.

Now it is understood that the government's role is to keep downward pressure on inflation and to create a sound financial and legal framework in which enterprise can flourish.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: We have learned that it is not governments that create wealth, but people, provided we have policies that encourage them to do it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: We have also got away from the debilitating concept of the all-powerful state which takes too much from you to do too much for you, constantly substituting the politicians' view of what the people should have for the people's own view of what they want.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: We have had our own perestroika. As a result the economy has been growing steadily for seven years, soon to be eight, there are more resources available for the community's needs, and we have a budget surplus with which to repay debt.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, you can never do that except by first restoring the spirit of the people. The great economists of the past knew this. Adam Smith was not a professor of economics. He was a professor of moral philosophy. He understood how to work with the grain of human nature. He knew the heights which it could reach, which is why his policies for creating the Wealth of Nations will endure throughout the years.

Today you can feel the pride and confidence both in Britain and in Canada. Both our countries have learned that lesson. As a result we have achieved remarkable economic success, and today we jostle for the top place in the OECD's growth stakes.

Among the Economic Summit seven countries, sound money, lower taxes, and freedom for enterprise are now common form. It was not always so; but every year since the second cycle of summits started in 1982 the Heads of Government have committed themselves to those policies as the best basis for stable and long-term growth.

We have put behind us the financial irresponsibility which made the 1970s a decade of missed opportunity. I do not believe that the world could have withstood the shock of last autumn's fall in stock prices so well if our policies had not been built on sure foundations. We have established a new orthodoxy.

Low inflation and prudent financial policies need to be supported by open markets and flourishing world trade. Here too the Toronto Summit took important steps forward. We committed ourselves to the success of the GATT-round trade negotiations and encouraged measures to free up world trade.

Mr. Speaker, by 1992 every firm in Europe, whether engaged in manufacturing or in services, will have a single market of 320 million people. What a dramatic development that is going to be! To add to it, the Channel Tunnel will give Britain for the first time in our history a land border with Europe.

There will be new opportunities of every kind, not just for member countries of the European Community themselves but for those countries which trade with the Community.

Let me reassure you: it is not Britain's intention when removing barriers within Europe to see them raised against our other trading partners outside Europe.

Canada and the United States are pointing the way with a Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement which the Economic Summit warmly endorsed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Thatcher: I understand that it may be a controversial matter in this Chamber. I will only say that I do not underestimate Canada's courage in taking this step in partnership with its giant neighbour. On the basis of Britain's experience of joining the European Community, you need have no fear that Canada's national personality will be in any way diminished. Fifteen years of European Community membership have left our people no less British and no less proud of their history and independence. Moreover, protectionism is not a life-belt which keeps an economy afloat. It is a millstone that drags you down and penalizes consumers and workforce alike. Subsidize the inefficient and soon that is all you have; you lose the competitive edge to export abroad and keep prices down at home.

There is another major world problem which we committed ourselves to deal with at the Summit. Agriculture will have to bring supply and demand more into balance. Until we do that, farmers will not feel secure in their future.

Look at the situation now. Countries compete with each other to give bigger and bigger subsidies. Farmers in Japan are being paid eight times the world price for rice. In the United States, in 1986, one single state received more loans and other aid from Washington than all the nations in Africa got from the World Bank. In Europe, the subsidy per cow is greater than the personal income of half the world's people.

• (1130)

Even Canada is not a model of absolute virtue, though may I take this opportunity to express my sympathy for the plight of your farmers who are suffering so badly from drought.

Abba Eban once said: "History teaches us that men and nations behave wisely once they have exhausted all other alternatives". Well, with agriculture we have exhausted all other alternatives. In Europe we have made a start in cutting back surpluses and reducing stockpiles, in some cases with dramatic results.

At Toronto we all recognized that setting realistic goals for reducing subsidies on a fair basis in all our countries offered a way forward, a way forward which will offer a surer future for our farmers, a better deal for our consumers, and hope for the Third World countries whose markets are unfairly saturated by the sale of our subsidized surpluses.

Mr. Speaker, here in this Chamber we are all privileged to be active in government and politics at a time of unprecedented hope and opportunity in relations between East and West. President Reagan's recent Summit meeting in Moscow with Mr. Gorbachev was an historic success. A new chapter in East-West relations has been opened.

We owe that to President Reagan because of his firmness and the way he has stuck resolutely to his convictions and beliefs. We owe it also to Mr. Gorbachev who, with a rare insight, has seen that communism has not been able to deliver the standard of living, of social services, of technological advance which its originators promised.

He has had the vision and resolve to embark on a course which, by mobilizing great personal responsibility and initiative, will bring greater benefits. It is not going to be an easy path for the Soviet Union and its allies in Eastern Europe. Those who engage in great endeavours never find the going easy, but it is in our interests as well as those of the Soviet people that he reach his goal.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: Every enlargement of liberty serves the interests of all mankind. The foundations of this new hope in East-West relations were not laid in recent months. They were built up over the last four decades by the resolve of the Governments and peoples at the heart of the western world—the United States, Britain, and Canada pre-eminent among them—to defend liberty, justice, and democracy however heavy the burden and whatever the price.

Now we are beginning to reap the rewards: the Agreement to reduce Intermediate Nuclear Forces and the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan. Who would have thought, five years ago when I last spoke in this Chamber, that either of these things would come about?

The more hopeful signs from the Soviet Union are bound to raise questions in people's minds: Can't we take a chance? Do we need to go on with the present level of spending on defence? Hasn't the time come when we can relax our guard? Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more dangerous.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: First, we cannot base our defence on hope, only on reality, and the reality is that Soviet military spending continues to grow and their weapons systems are being constantly modernized and updated in every field. Their forces are far in excess of what they need for defensive purposes alone.

Second, we do not know whether Mr. Gorbachev will succeed in his new policies. Old ways die hard and there is still little evidence that the Soviet Union's long-term foreign policy objectives have changed. We can hope for the best, but a prudent defence must plan for the worst case.

Third, modern weapons are so sophisticated that they take many years to plan and to produce. A mistake or miscalculation now could leave us vulnerable and unprotected at a time when our potential enemies are continuing to increase their military strength.

Fourth, we are in a position to welcome the changes taking place in the Soviet Union because we know that whatever happens our defence is sure.

For nearly 40 years that remarkable organization, NATO, has kept the peace. It has done so because everyone knew that an attack on one member would be an attack on all and we would respond accordingly and because we have had an effective mix of nuclear and conventional weapons and kept them up to date.

I pay particular tribute to Canada's contribution to NATO's strength and success by the way in which she welcomes our troops to train and exercise; by the resolute manner in which she agreed to test Cruise missiles over her territory, a demonstration of resolve which was crucial at that time; and by her intention to modernize her Navy by acquiring nuclear powered submarines—we very much hope, from Britain.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Thatcher: They are quite the best, and Canada must have the best.

Mr. Speaker, wars are not caused by strength or by armaments. They happen when nations are weak in the face of others who are both ambitious and strong.

Our duty is to preserve NATO's strength by constantly updating our weapons, both nuclear and conventional; by maintaining, as you do, highly professional and trained armed forces; and by demonstrating our united resolve.

Peace with freedom and justice is the most precious thing we have, both for our generation and for our children. That is the trust they place in us and we must not fail them.

Mr. Speaker, we always remember what lies at the very root of the differences between the Soviet system and the free world. It is a fundamentally different view of the role of the individual and his rights in society.

History has not equipped the Russian people with the capacity to escape easily from the incubus of state socialism. They know nothing of personal liberty, have never experienced an independent judiciary, and are strangers to tolerance and the checks and balances which operate in a free society.

People used to believe that dictatorships had the advantage of being more efficient and better able to act decisively than the democracies. They were wrong. Now they understand that you cannot plan and regulate everything, and that if you try you lose the driving force of human nature and its inventive-ness and creativity.

In modern societies success depends on openness, on free discussion, and on easy access to information. We in the West could never have experienced the great surge of technological advance without them. Once you try to suppress and restrain them, then not only are you unable to change, you are unable to respond to change.

Mr. Speaker, the example of what freedom has achieved in the open societies of the West is a powerful incentive to the closed societies of the Eastern bloc to extend it to their people and to accept restraints on the power of those who rule, but the case for freedom can never be merely a material one. It is a moral crusade.

The communist societies still see human rights as something given by the state, which can be taken away by the state. For us, they are something so fundamental that they cannot be given or taken away by any government or human agency.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Thatcher: Those who would have us believe that speaking out about human rights runs counter to the aim of better relations play into the hands of the enemies of freedom.

As President Reagan recently said in an inspired speech in London's Guildhall immediately after the Moscow Summit: "When free peoples cease telling the truth about and to their adversaries, they cease telling the truth to themselves. In matters of state, unless the truth be spoken, it ceases to exist".

Mr. Speaker, freedom is on the offensive as never before, a peaceful offensive pursued by example and by persuasion. Its triumph is our highest ambition.

• (1140)

In taking his leave of you in 1952, Winston Churchill did not say goodbye. Rather, he said:

[Translation]

"Goodbye, my Canadian friends. Tomorrow a splendid future awaits you."

[English]

It is indeed a splendid future that awaits Canada, one filled with opportunity and pride. I know that Britain and Canada will walk that road together, unswerving in our purpose, strong in our joint defence, and firm in our abiding friendship.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Prime Minister, the Parliament of Canada takes pride in having you as one of its illustrious guests. We are delighted with the decision to welcome you every five years, until the end of this century. You will go down in history with Robert Walpole and his twenty-two tenacious years, and especially William Pitt, who in 1783 decided to hold the reins of power until the beginning of the next century. Typically, contemporary political historians always try to compare you with your illustrious predecessors, two of whom I have just mentioned, and I may also include Disraeli. After listening very attentively to your speech, we understand the reason for these flattering comparisons.

[English]

In greeting you today, Prime Minister, we have been mindful not only of the fact that you are Britain's first woman Prime Minister—and we applaud this—but also of the remarkable place you have carved for yourself in the history of British Prime Ministers. The characteristics which have contributed to your success are legendary. Conviction, tenacity, firmness: in the shifting winds of political fortune, these are the ballast that leaders must carry with them, and when they are combined with vision, patience, and an inexhaustible capacity for hard work, one can expect that the ship of state will sail forward.

Your success in putting your country back on the road to prosperity is so evident that your name is always invoked in every discussion of international affairs and economics. Many debaters, not knowing whether they should refer to England or to Great Britain or to the United Kingdom, take a short cut and say quite simply "Thatcherland".

The world knows that you are a leader of determination and that very often you discard consensus politics. In that, you remind us of our Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, counting the votes in his Cabinet and saying: "Thirteen against my proposition, one for; the yeas have it".

A century ago, Oscar Wilde, in his humorous way, dared to write: "The Lords Temporal say nothing; the Lords Spiritual have nothing to say; and the House of Commons has nothing to say and says it". Had he been living today, he might have added: The Prime Minister has something to say and says it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senator Charbonneau: Madam Prime Minister, on behalf of my colleagues in the Senate of Canada, I wish to thank you for honouring us with your presence today.

[Translation]

It was indeed an honour and a privilege to hear you, as a distinguished representative of the Mother of Parliaments, address the Parliament of Canada, and we are most grateful.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Madam Prime Minister, let me add my own words of appreciation, on behalf of all Members of the House of Commons, and to thank you for your eloquent words and the message you have left with us.

The rare assemblies of both Houses of our Parliament, such as this, are reserved for very special and honoured guests. You, Madam Prime Minister, are among the foremost of them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Indeed, as has been remarked, this is your second address to us in five years—a mark, surely, of the mutual interests and good will that exists between our two countries.

[Translation]

Thank you, Prime Minister, for having given us this opportunity to further strengthen the ties of friendship that exist between Canada and the United Kingdom.

[English]

It is not every day that we are privileged to listen in this Chamber to one of the longest serving leaders in the democratic world. You have given us much to reflect upon.

I believe I speak on behalf of all members of the House when I say that one of the continuing benefits of these high level exchanges is to reinforce the positive aspects of international relations between our two countries, and to give a political impetus to resolving those irritants that may arise in any complex relationship.

It would be appropriate to remind ourselves that our Members of Parliament and yours are meeting constantly in the closest and most effective relationship.

[Translation]

Prime Minister, you are among friends.

[English]

In closing, may I say that we look forward to further dialogue and the continuation of vibrant relations between our two nations. The warm association which binds us is a precious asset not only for today but also for the challenging world which our children will inherit. You are among friends. We wish you to come again. God bless you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, June 28, 1988

The Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT
(Report No. 44)

Pursuant to the Order of Reference approved by the Senate on November 27, 1986 and by the House of Commons on December 17, 1986, and to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, the Joint Committee wishes to inform both Houses of its decision not to review and scrutinize the statutory instruments made by certain statutory courts.

At present, the Statutory Instruments Act applies to "a rule, order or regulation governing the practice and procedure in proceedings before a judicial or quasi-judicial body established by or under an Act of Parliament" (S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, s. 2(1)(d)(iv)). Any such rule, order or regulation is subject to the requirements of the Act respecting the examination, registration and publication of regulations and to review and scrutiny by the Joint Committee on behalf of the Houses. Your Committee has given consideration to the propriety of subjecting the rules made by statutory courts to the control of Parliament. It appears to us that in many instances, these courts are intended by Parliament to enjoy the same degree of independence as that which the Constitution Act, 1867 guarantees to superior courts. Parliamentary control of the delegated legislation adopted by these courts is not entirely consistent with the principle of the independence of the judiciary.

In determining which procedural rules should be exempt from scrutiny, the Joint Committee believes that the most reliable criterion is the nature of the tenure enjoyed by the members of a particular court. A distinguishing characteristic of those courts to which Parliament wishes to give the same degree of independence as that guaranteed to the superior courts by the Constitution is that their members hold office "during good behaviour". The importance of this criterion is explained by one authority as follows:

"Judges are in one important respect different from all other public officials. Generally speaking, public officials are accountable for their acts both politically and legally. The fact that judges hold office during good behaviour means in effect that they cannot be removed except for misbehaviour, so that political accountability, [...] does not apply to them." (J.R. Mallory, The Structure of Canadian Government, 2nd ed., p. 318)

Tenure during good behaviour, meant to guarantee the independence of the judiciary, also has consequences for parliamentary control of delegated legislation. If the members of statutory courts are not accountable for the exercise of their jurisdiction, your Committee does not consider they ought to be accountable to the Houses for the exercise of the rule-making powers delegated to them by Parliament. Admittedly, the making of rules of practice and procedure is a legislative rather than a judicial function. However, the Joint Committee believes this legislative function to be so closely connected to the exercise of their jurisdiction that in exercising it, judges are entitled to the same independence as they enjoy with respect to the exercise of their judicial function.

These considerations have led the Committee to its decision not to scrutinize the procedural rules made by certain courts, such as the Supreme Court of Canada or the Tax Court of Canada. On the other hand, the Joint Committee will continue to review and scrutinize the rules of practice and procedure made by tribunals whose members are not appointed during good behaviour including, for example, those made by the National Transportation Agency or the Canada Labour Relations Board.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-141, an Act to regulate the marketing of agricultural products in import, export and interprovincial trade and to provide for national standards and grades of agricultural products, for their inspection and grading, for the registration of establishments and for standards governing establishments.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to make a statement, following accusations by the Ottawa Citizen that materials, taxis, telephones and personal mails have been used by my office in support of my wife's campaign for the Liberal nomination, and all of this in an improper manner. I want to refer particularly to the matter of seven people who had been hired to make telephone calls, and the allegation that it was only after Mr. Jarvis had demanded payment that payment was, in fact, made by me.

Research seems to indicate that the decision as to what is in keeping with the proper use of Senate funds and mail and other items is really based on the honour system, that there are virtually no written guidelines, and that the decisions are up to the senator involved.

I want to make a number of things clear. First, with regard to the arrangements I made with Mr. Jarvis to procure seven persons to make telephone calls from my office, it was agreed that Mr. Jarvis would procure their services and that I would be billed for the amount and would pay it myself. Contrary to news reports, at no time did Mr. Jarvis ask me to repay this account. I paid this of my own volition and without any request being made to me by anyone.

With regard to personnel working for me, I have followed the practice for some years of hiring, on my own behalf, a number of people on short-term contracts rather than spending my secretarial allocation on one person. In the fiscal year 1987-88—and this is taken from a report that was made to the Internal Economy Committee—all of the items of expenditures on behalf of employees in my office fell considerably short of the total allocation for a senator's secretary.

In the current year to date, totalling all of the funds paid for secretarial work, there is a substantial amount of money remaining. In the case of research assistance, the bulk of that budget or that allocation remains to be spent. The personnel provided to my office has come, and comes today, well within the provisions of the moneys allocated by the Senate.

Allegations have been made that taxis have been used on behalf of my wife's campaign that have been paid for by the Senate. On reviewing the history of these taxi chits, it is a fact that in recent months and weeks the number of taxi chits coming to my office increased substantially. At no time was any flag waved; at no time did any official contact me or, as far as I know, anyone in my office to say, "There are an unduly large number of chits coming to your office." At no time, as I have said, was I informed by Senate Personnel that this situation was as I have stated. Of my own volition, I have repaid all of the expenses incurred to the Senate by way of these taxi chits for the period January 1 of this year to date.

French lessons have been provided to one member of my staff. This arrangement is entirely between that person and Senate Personnel.

There is the question of printing and printing supplies. The submission from the Clerk's office shows that supplies in the amount of 86,060 sheets of paper, ink, a few thousand envelopes and related supplies were made available, totalling $320.70, and the total amount of this category is $1,291.70. Sixty thousand of these sheets were used in bulk mail, and the remaining numbers were used for a number of other substantial mail-outs, including mail for a Christmas party and a large mail-out to promote a health conference that I was pleased to assist in sponsoring, held in room 200 on March 22. A later health conference involving many of the same people, held in room 200, was sponsored by Senator Haidasz, Mr. A. Redway, a Conservative MP, and some ten other Conservative members of Parliament.

I believe that this explains, according to the document that was provided to the Internal Economy Committee, the supplies that were provided and the printing that took place. I want to say that others have been refused printing by the printer, and I understand that on certain occasions appeals have been made. I made an appeal to the Clerk on the basis of the householder mail, but in every other instance, if the printer decided that a request should not be followed, I made no objection whatsoever.

Then there was the question of the number of telephones in my office. These telephones were provided as a result of a conversation I had with the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. Subsequently, I sent a memorandum to Mr. Jalbert confirming the understanding. I could read all of the memorandum, but I think it would be sufficient if I read the concluding paragraph only.

This memorandum is dated December 10, 1987. It is addressed to Major René Jalbert, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and it is signed by me. This memorandum is requesting additional telephones, and the last paragraph says:

In any event I do not want to charge to the Senate any telephone services I may have over the normal maximum number allowed Senators.

I have received no request for any payment with regard to the telephones in my office.

Information has been supplied with regard to the amount of postage that was used. This information was provided by the Senate Post Office. It shows three items: January 29, 1988, $394.05; February 7, 1988, $550; March 7, 1988, $66.96. I should like to explain to honourable senators that $66.96 was paid to the Senate Post Office for the purpose of sending out a bulk mailing. The other $944.05 was used to purchase 37-cent stamps from the post office. This was a commercial transaction, and I think requires no further explanation.

Honourable senators, I wonder if the Ottawa Citizen, in being so interested in Senate activity, is guilty of a double standard. There was a campaign by Maureen McTeer to win a Conservative nomination. Referring to that activity, Maclean's magazine of May 23, 1988, had this to say:

McTeer's slick campaign was directed by a team of seasoned organizers headed by Robert Valcov, chief of staff to Jean Charest, federal minister of state for youth, fitness and amateur sport.

The Ottawa Citizen, on May 20, 1988, reports that on McTeer's campaign there were a dozen members of Clark's staff in External Affairs roaming the aisles with walkie-talkies.

[Senator Argue.]

That was the night of the nomination. The Citizen also reported that she had a top-flight campaign manager.

When looking at the Senate and the Argue campaign, would it be fair to ask why the Citizen does not give the same attention to the Clark-McTeer campaign, make an inquiry, and apply the same standards of investigation?

I believe it is correct to say that we in the Senate operate quite generally on an honour system. I believe all of us—at least nearly all of us—are members of a political party. Some of the activity in my office is, and has been from the time I first became a senator, in support of my political party, and for this I make no apology.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: I am pleased to be able to report to the Senate on this question of privilege and to deliver the facts contained therein.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-NINTH MEETING HELD AT KEY WEST, FLORIDA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present to the Senate, in the two official languages, the report of the parliamentary delegation of the Canadian section of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group that attended the twenty-ninth annual meeting in Key West, Florida, from May 5 to 9, 1988.

I have no hesitation in saying that this year's meeting with the delegation from the United States Congress was the most informative, relevant and successful inter-parliamentary meeting that I, personally, have attended. Not surprisingly, the U.S. delegation asked that this year's agenda be devoted almost entirely to the Free Trade Agreement. Accordingly, at three plenary sessions a range of issues relating to the agreement were dealt with. Since both delegations were well informed on trade issues, a valuable exchange of views took place. Senior U.S. delegates commented that they had found the meeting both useful and instructive.

I might add that, particularly on the U.S. House side, the delegation included a number of influential figures, including three important House committee chairmen and, as well, the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, a particularly key figure in the procedure related to the Free Trade Agreement.

While most of the meeting was spent on issues specifically related to the agreement, discussions in committee also dealt with other bilateral subjects, such as subsidies, acid rain, fisheries, Great Lakes levels and Arctic sovereignty.

On the thorny subject of subsidies, the group decided to set up a subcommittee to compare the subsidies of the two countries. It was considered that negotiations to develop a common code on subsidies as specified under the agreement might be made easier if parliamentarians were knowledgeable about each other's incentives.

On acid rain, the Canadians pressed the U.S. legislators to bring forward legislation to curb emissions into Canada. In addition, the co-chairman of the Canadian section, Patrick Nowlan, MP, and I responded with a follow-up letter to an offer by a senior U.S. congressman to investigate why the Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency was not applying a section of the U.S. Clean Air Act that mandated curbs on emissions reaching across international borders.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that the report of the twenty-ninth meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 3816).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two about this matter. I want to concur with the remarks of Senator Balfour that this meeting was extremely useful. I will not go into any of the details, but I know that certain explanations given by the Canadian delegates to the members of both houses of the United States Congress were very informative both as to their consideration respecting the free trade arrangement, which they dealt with for the most part, and with respect to other subjects as well.

• (1420)

Without going into a long explanation, I wish to concur that it was an extremely useful exchange of views on a number of important matters to both our countries.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY ON REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to table its seventeenth report, respecting the National Film Board production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 3857.)

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, with your permission, I should like to make a few comments on the report. Before proceeding, I think it is significant that I call the attention of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of Mr.

George Pearson, the new producer of the film on Billy Bishop, and of Colonel A. J. Bauer, who will be a consultant on the new film.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, it is with a sense of some relief that I table the final report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs on the examination of the National Film Board production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

First of all, may I express my appreciation to Senator Tremblay, chairman of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, for giving me the privilege of tabling the report. As well, may I thank him for the confidence he extended to the subcommittee, allowing it to act with freedom and independence in carrying out its duties. I also extend my respect to all members of the parent committee for their support.

In extending our appreciation to the members of the subcommittee, Deputy Chairman Senator Bonnell and Senators Molson and David, and as well to Senators Everett and McElman, who, although not members of the subcommittee, attended all meetings, and to others who gave devoted support to us and participated in the fight against this significant challenge to the fundamental rights of a Canadian hero, we, as a legitimate arm of Parliament, can take satisfaction in our efforts to protect the record of Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, V.C., B.C., DSO and Bar, M.C., D.F.C.

I want to remind the Senate that it was our distinguished colleague and Battle of Britain fighter pilot, the Honourable Senator Molson, who initially raised this matter in a speech given in the Senate on February 7, 1984, less than a year after the release of the film, but over four years ago. I want to pay special tribute to him.

To my mind, and I am sure to most of us, through his efforts he set an example to those who responded to his leadership and contributed to carrying out one of the Senate's responsibilities, that of protecting an individual's rights.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: As honourable senators are aware, when the subcommittee which I chair was formed, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, it provided a forum to which Senator Molson could refer the matter of the examination of the Billy Bishop film, and he did so on September 18, 1985. The order of reference was made a few weeks later, on October 8, 1985.

I insert here for the record the date of April 15, 1986, when our first report was tabled and then debated with a resulting vote of 28 to 17 in favour of referring the matter back to the committee for reconsideration. That took place on May 18, 1986. I make that insertion to establish that, although we were not able to resolve the matter at the time, the wide publicity which the committee's hearings received commanded the attention of veterans' groups and of citizens, who joined in support of the Senate's action and caused an outcry across the country against the action of the film's producer in putting forward a thesis that, without evidence and without any apparent good reason or cause, demeaned the reputation of our foremost military hero.

In the second phase of our examination, new evidence was brought forward by Mr. Wesley Rogers of Thunder Bay, the son of a close friend of Billy Bishop; an essay written to him by Freddie Bourne about his service as Bishop's mechanic contradicts the producer's thesis. I hope honourable senators will read the report I have tabled today, particularly the section that illustrates the close relationship that exists between pilot and mechanic, which, in the case of Bourne and Bishop, was a relationship based on mutual trust, faith and respect, because the mechanic holds his pilot's life in his hands every day and hour that the plane is in the air.

Another contradiction of the producer's thesis was put forward in information given to the subcommittee by Robert Bradford, associate director of the National Aviation Museum. He disproved the film's plot surrounding technicalities of landing a Nieuport 17 and taking off again without assistance, the damage suffered by the aircraft as reported by Bishop's squadron commander, and the question of the missing machine gun. I hope that honourable senators will also pay attention to this new evidence.

I stress that during our deliberations we did encounter criticism of the fact that a body of Parliament would dare question the freedom of expression and artistic licence concept of the filmmaker. But, regardless of the criticism, I believe it was absolutely necessary that the inquiry be undertaken. In fact, I think that, on balance, the whole exercise may have done Canadians some good.

It may have prompted us to guard against those who, for reasons of notoriety or whatever, would distort or ridicule the recorded deeds of our forefathers. Honourable senators, we ought to take great pride in our historical achievements, not search for dubious methods to belittle them.

Much of the discussion about the film centered on the wording of a disclaimer that the subcommittee insisted be inserted in the film. When our first report was tabled, the following disclaimer was detailed:

This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne.

That is the truth, honourable senators.

That disclaimer was not adopted by the National Film Board, which came back with its own version of a disclaimer:

The film you are about to see is a docu-drama.

It is a perspective on the nature of heroism and the legend of Billy Bishop.

[Senator Marshall.]

It contains both actual documentary footage and dramatized segments.

The NFB disclaimer, however, was not acceptable to the subcommittee, if only because it did not clarify for audiences the fact that Bishop's air mechanic had been grossly misrepresented in the film. It was finally agreed between the government film commissioner and myself, in a private meeting and in follow-up correspondence which is included in the report, that the disclaimer to "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" would read as follows:

This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be a biography of Billy Bishop. Certain characters have been used to express certain doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the actual characters.

The National Film Board agreed to add this disclaimer following its logo in the film so that it might not be missed by presenters or audiences. The National Film Board also agreed that Colonel A.J. Bauer, who provided research assistance to myself and other members of the subcommittee throughout the years of the study and to whom we owe a debt of gratitude, will be a consultant on the new documentary to be produced by the Film Board.

I feel satisfied, honourable senators, that the new film will be a quality production that will properly fit within the mandate of the National Film Board to "show Canada to Canadians and to others".

The approach of producer George Pearson, whom I introduced earlier, will be to emphasize three facets of World War I aviation and Canada's role in it. He will describe the machines and their structure and the challenge they offered to airmen. He will show how the tactics of air warfare were developed. He will present the achievements of Canadian aviators and the place of Billy Bishop among them.

I believe Mr. Pearson will produce a work that will make us proud of our heritage and, more significantly, proud of the work that our National Film Board can do. But the new film will be a far cry from the solution that was demanded of me by some 77,000 protesting Canadian veterans and others. They wanted, and I wanted—and I still want—the National Film Board to withdraw "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", because it is an historically inaccurate film that does not tell the truth about a significant individual Canadian.

Nevertheless, what we will achieve by the new film is probably the best that we can hope for at this time. To my mind, it is most regrettable that the National Film Board willingly permits itself to suffer continuing criticism of the earlier production for as long as that film remains in circulation. It is even more regrettable that successive Ministers of Communications, and many others who might have exercised influence since 1983, have condoned distribution of the film and have refused to support the subcommittee.

The new film will be in the format of a one-hour television documentary. It is a mark of the intent of the producer that the film will not be completed until probably late 1989 or even early 1990. Mr. Pearson has already visited Owen Sound, Bishop's home town, and has spoken with Colonel Bauer and others there. He has already consulted with officials in the directorate of history of the Department of National Defence, with Mr. Robert Bradford, to whom I referred earlier, the associate director of the National Aviation Museum, and with Mr. Philip Markham, a notable Ottawa air researcher.

Just last week some members of the subcommittee and I had a luncheon discussion with Mr. Pearson. As a result, I am hopeful that we will see a new film that will give a proper perspective of the place in history of Canadian aviators and their machines and how they operated those machines to the great benefit of our veterans, our allies and our national heritage.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1987

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Charles Turner, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 5, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-131, An Act to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 28, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

CHARLES TURNER
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. William J. Petten, for Hon. Royce Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 5, 1988

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SIXTIETH REPORT

With respect to its meeting of Thursday, June 30, 1988, your Committee reports the following decisions for approval by the Senate.

1. With respect to printing requests and use of other Senate facilities, all Senators are on the honour system and staff will accede to the requests of all Senators made in the course of carrying out their senatorial duties.
2. With respect to the submission by the lawyers of the Ottawa Citizen entitled: "Submissions of the Ottawa Citizen to attend Committee hearings dealing with the use of Senate monies for the Jean Argue Liberal nomination campaign", your Committee considered the submission and decided by a majority that the submission does not need a verbal clarification.

Respectfully submitted,

ROYCE FRITH
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Petten, report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

MACEDONIA

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, July 12, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the question of Macedonia.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PROBLEMS OF TRANSPORTATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, July 7, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the problems of transportation in the province of Prince Edward Island.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE INTERIM REPORT ON PRODUCTION AND USE OF NATURAL GAS IN CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That, in the event of an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds one week, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to publish and distribute its Ninth Report (interim) on the examination of the production and use of natural gas in Canada, with particular reference to natural gas deregulation, or any matter relating thereto, as soon as it becomes available; and,

That, in the event of a prorogation of Parliament, the Honourable Senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, be authorized to publish and distribute the above-mentioned interim report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if we can have an explanation of this motion from the chairman?

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I presented the motion, as deputy chairman, on behalf of our chairman, Senator Hastings, who is out of the country.

Senator Flynn: That is a good explanation.

Senator Balfour: The purpose is that, notwithstanding the fact the Senate is not sitting or an election is called, the publication and the distribution of the report, which is presently in the writing stage, will be carried forward.

Motion agreed to.

CHILD CARE

DEADLINE EXTENDED FOR PRESENTATION OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE REPORT ON FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE ON CHILD CARE ENTITLED "SHARING THE RESPONSIBILITY" AND FEDERAL RESPONSE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Spivak, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, 9th February, 1988, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized to continue its examination of the Final Report of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Child Care, entitled: "Sharing the Responsibility", be empowered to present its report no later than Friday, September 30, 1988.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Balfour.]

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

CANADA-IRAN RELATIONS

NORMALIZATION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

[English]

Does the Government of Canada intend to continue its efforts to re-establish normal diplomatic relations with Iran?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the answer is yes.

Senator Corbin: I presume, if I understand the answer, that efforts are under way, but does the Government of Canada not realize that in doing so at this time it would give immense credibility to the Khomeini régime, which is responsible for the deaths of tens of thousands of young Iranians in the most violent fashion, and that it would, at the same time, recognize a régime which is responsible for one of the cruelest wars in this century, a régime which refuses to sit down with Iraq to talk peace? Does the government not feel that to do so would not be in the best interests of Canadians at this time?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Canada and Iran have never ceased to recognize each other in the diplomatic sense. After the 1980 incident, with which my honourable friend is familiar, Canada withdrew its diplomats from Tehran and Iran downgraded its representation here and left a Chargé d'affaires in Ottawa. Since 1982 discussions have been going on between our two countries as to the possible normalization of relations between Iran and Canada.

The stumbling block for some time seems to have been that Iran was insisting that Canada apologize for its part in harbouring and assisting in the escape from Iran of United States diplomats. This, of course, Canada, under both the previous government and the present government, has refused to do.

That stumbling block aside, we have consistently made known our view that Canada has no interest in maintaining strained relations with that country and would prefer to proceed to normalize our relations with them.

● (1450)

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, of course I understand that we are talking about re-establishing normal diplomatic relations with Iran. Nevertheless, we are dealing with a régime that is vicious in more ways than one. I cannot see what we hope to gain by not letting matters stand as they have since the crisis over the American hostages.

With a régime that could be ousted one way or another—not necessarily tomorrow, but in coming weeks, months or within a year—we would not necessarily be ingratiating ourselves with an eventual new government by recognizing one that has used violent means to kill its own citizens and to push them into the trenches to be killed and refuses to sit down and negotiate a peace settlement. It seems to me that is not the position Canada has taken in the past with respect to other conflicts, in the United Nations forum for example.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, without trying to enter into a debate in the oral Question Period, the fact of the matter is that, while my friend uses the term “recognition”, there is no question of recognizing or not recognizing Iran. We have never ceased to recognize that country and the government now in place in that country. There are many countries whose governments may be ousted, as my friend puts it, within the next year or two.

Senator Olson: Including this one.

Senator Murray: We recognize the governments of many countries that my friend and others in Canada would consider by most normal standards to be undesirable. Nevertheless, we recognize the de facto situation in those countries, and we have never found that there is much to be gained by cutting off diplomatic recognition of a country for the reasons that my friend has stated.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, one of the conditions which Iran demanded for re-establishing full diplomatic relations between the two countries was that Canada apologize for what Canada's ambassador did in 1980 by assisting some American diplomats to get out of the country. Is that still the condition today?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, on the basis of recent discussions that Canada has had in Ottawa, we have some reason to believe that that condition has been dropped.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—EFFECT ON PRICE OF BREAD

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to request that his colleague the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, or his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, issue a statement correcting a very serious assertion by a number of people who claim that the price of bread will increase by 4 to 10 cents because of the increased price of wheat resulting from the drought. The fact is that it was only a little while ago that the government announced that it was discontinuing the two-price system, which meant that the millers paid the equivalent of $7 per bushel for the flour that they used in Canada. Surely, even with the increase in the price of grain to the producer, it is highly unlikely that it would return to $7 per bushel. Indeed, there should be an overall decline in the price of bread if it is to be attributed only to what the farmers get for the wheat.

• (1500)

I am not arguing that they ought not to have an increase. If they wish to have an increase in the price of bread, so be it; that is their business. However, to attribute it to an increase in the price of the flour going into that bread because of the increased cost of wheat produced by the farmers is simply an erroneous statement.

I have heard this five or six times on television and have read of it in the newspaper. Part of it is attributed to Mr. George Fleischmann, the president of the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada. I would appreciate it if the government were to correct this obviously erroneous statement.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall draw Senator Olson's statements to the attention of my ministerial colleagues. If they have any comment to make on those statements, I shall convey them to him.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TREATMENT OF CANADIAN CIRCUIT BOARDS BY UNITED STATES CUSTOMS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to our trade with the United States.

The other day the CBC aired a program indicating that exporters of Canadian circuit boards for computers are being harrassed by the U.S. Customs Service. Is the Leader of the Government willing to examine this issue and let us know if we are at fault? Are our circuit boards infringing upon intellectual property in the United States, as the Americans seem to allege, or is this gratuitous harrassment?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will investigate to see whether my colleagues are aware of the CBC broadcast to which the honourable senator refers, and, if so, whether they have any comment they would like to convey to the Senate on this matter.

Senator Gigantès: I thank the honourable senator, and I will anxiously await his answer.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

BULK EXPORT OF WATER—PROVISION FOR PROHIBITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I have read the book entitled “The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement”. I should like the Leader of the Government to tell us under which section in this book, which I have read cover to cover, as I am sure he has, the bulk export of water is prohibited. I am not talking about Perrier or Montclair, but exports in bulk.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not at all aware that there is an explicit prohibition contained in the book or in any other book. The point is that there is nothing in the agreement that requires Canada to engage in any form of international trade with regard to its water resources. The fact of the matter is that Canada has a policy in that regard, which was stated some months ago by my colleague the Minister of the Environment. We do not sanction, nor do we contemplate, the export of our water resources.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, there are explicit exclusions for other things, but there is not an explicit exclusion for water. Parts of this agreement exclude certain items, but water is not one of them.

Article 409 says something that, according to some Canadians who have been writing to me, makes it possible to export water. The minister's colleague says that it is not the government's intention to permit the bulk export of water.

However, Bill C-130 says that the agreement takes precedence over all our legislation. If someone starts exporting water, and the Americans say that this is proper under article 409, how do you stop them?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is within the competence of Canada to decide what to do about the export of its water resources. This government has taken a decision some time ago, announced by the Minister of the Environment, that we do not contemplate and we do not sanction or favour or permit the export of our water resources. I do not know what I can add to that.

However, if the honourable senator wishes to pursue the background to it in terms of the Free Trade Agreement and the status of any prohibition on water exports vis-à-vis the Free Trade Agreement, he has opportunity to do so in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is presently studying the Free Trade Agreement.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—EFFICACY AND PROPRIETY OF GOVERNMENT RECOMMENDATIONS AND ACTION

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, it appears that this past weekend a very sensitive, understanding and munificent government has undertaken some relief for the drought-stricken prairies. I am surprised that Senator Olson has not asked a question about this, since he has repeatedly been asking about it in the past.

I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if his recent and temporary crippled condition will allow him to rise to answer it. As you know, some months ago $12 million was provided for the PFRA, to help farmers in communities develop new water resources. That was only an early measure. Now we hear that the federal government, cost-sharing with the provincial governments, is providing somewhere in the region of $153 million for the livestock situation that has come about as a result of the drought.

[Senator Murray.]

Among the many measures in this are four other main thrusts. The first one is for the federal initiative to provide up to $100 million, cost-shared in per-head payments to livestock producers. These payments are up to $60 per head. The second thrust is for a federal-provincial initiative to provide a further $53 million to stimulate grain feeding production in the west, partly by allowing producers an estimated $15 per acre on some of their land with some restrictions applying. The third thrust has been to allow insured farmers, particularly in Saskatchewan, to allow grazing on their spring and fall-seeded crops as a source of animal feed, as those crops appear to be destined to virtually total failure in some areas. The final thrust is a tax deferral scheme for those livestock producers who, of necessity, must cull and do away with their herds because of the lack of forage. This scheme relates to a tax deferral for at least one year on the payment of taxes resulting from revenue obtained from such a sale in order to allow them to rebuild their herds in the future.

Inasmuch, Mr. Chairman, as these—

Senator Steuart: Are you asking a question? Yes or no!

Senator Barootes: I am sorry, I did not hear what the gentleman was braying.

Senator Doody: He wanted you to repeat the question!

Senator Barootes: The question is—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: May I ask a question?

Senator Barootes: Are you afraid that I am phrasing the question in the same way as you have done in the past?

Senator Gigantès: May I ask a question of Senator Barootes?

Senator Barootes: My question is this: In view of the fact that these suggestions and recommendations now being carried out are the same as those which your committee, of which I am a member, had recommended to the federal government, would you comment on the efficacy and propriety of these recommendations?

Senator Gigantès: I should like to ask Senator Barootes a question on his question.

Senator Barootes: I am asking a question of the chairman.

Senator Gigantès: Would Senator Barootes agree that when he refers to the munificence of this government he should instead refer to the munificence of the Canadian taxpayers?

Senator Barootes: I would be very happy to make that acknowledgement.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, on behalf of the members of the committee, I believe it is safe to say that we are very pleased with the government's announcement. As Senator Barootes observed in answering his own question, the program tracks very closely the recommendations made by the standing Senate committee, passed unanimously in a bipartisan spirit, I might say, by the committee and subsequently passed in the same bipartisan spirit unanimously by this chamber on June 8. It does go further than the committee's recommendations with respect to assistance for forage, and I think it is safe to say that we are all pleased to see that.

● (1510)

As to the adequacy of the program, my personal opinion is that it is adequate. It will be difficult to define those areas of western Canada where the program will take effect and those where it will not, because it is difficult to say where the drought ends and where it starts. However, subject to the two levels of government doing a good job on that matter, I think we in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are very pleased to see this occur.

The only complaint that we have—and I think it is a proper one—is that it would have been more appropriate to announce the program on June 8, when this chamber gave approval to the recommendations of the committee, which reported on June 1 pursuant to a reference moved by Senator Olson.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM RE DIMINUTION OF NATIONAL PERSONALITY—EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of comments made by the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher to both houses of Parliament in the House of Commons Chamber on June 28 of this year, which appear at page 3783 of the Debates of the Senate. These are Mrs. Thatcher's comments, and they have not been taken out of context:

On the basis of Britain's experience of joining the European Community, you need have no fear that Canada's national personality will be in any way diminished.

Honourable senators, as you know, the European Community, under the Treaty of Rome, has more than a free trade arrangement. It involves a whole number of political institutions, commissions, the European Council, the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament. In view of this, I wonder if the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher knows something that the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney has not disclosed to the Canadian public—in other words, that this Free Trade Agreement is part of a larger political agenda with the United States.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom was making a point that I would have thought was obvious, even to the honourable senator: that Great Britain had maintained its own identity and sense of Britishness even in a community that, as the honourable senator notes, features far more integration than would be contemplated under a simple free trade treaty such as the one contemplated between Canada and the United States.

Senator Grafstein: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is really not responding to my question. My question is whether or not the Free Trade Agreement is part of a preliminary step leading to a number of other bilateral, structural and institutional arrangements paralleling those that are in place between the United Kingdom and the European Community.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend and a number of his friends are trying, quite unsuccessfully, to spread that story around the country and to alarm Canadian citizens about what the future holds. As I say, the attempt has been noticeably unsuccessful. People see the free trade treaty between Canada and the United States for what it is: an obvious economic step to take between the two countries that have the biggest trading relationship in the world in order to lower trade barriers to the benefit and for the prosperity of people on both sides of the border.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Does the Leader of the Government imply that it is the same thing to have as a final arbiter of trade disputes among partners a council such as exists in the Economic Community, where the small nations have nine votes and the four large nations have four, and thus the four large nations can be split by coalitions of small nations? Is he comparing that to the sort of arrangement we and the Americans will have—a binational arrangement wherein the Americans, representing 250 million people, have a vote and we, representing 25 million, have another vote? I say to him: Which of these votes will have the most clout and who will support us?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, this is a rather academic argument that the honourable senator is making. He may wish to pursue it again in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs where the treaty is being studied, or again in that committee when Bill C-130 is being pre-studied, if it gets there.

For the moment, I simply remind the honourable senator that there are vetos in the European Economic Community and there are also vetos held by each partner in the proposed Canada-U.S. agreement, the ultimate veto being our right—and theirs—to renounce the agreement.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government in the Senate put on the record this veto, which makes the term "binding" utterly ludicrous in the sense that, if a binational panel—and afterwards the commission—finds against the United States, and the U.S. does not want to apply that finding according to several articles in Chapter XVIII and Chapter XIX of the agreement, then our last recourse is either to retaliate or to leave the agreement.

Since trade with the United States represents 24 per cent of our gross domestic product, but trade with us only represents for the Americans 2 per cent of their gross domestic product, the damage that they can do when they retaliate is much heavier than the damage we might do. Also, the problem of withdrawal, once further ties have been created, is much greater for us than it is for the Americans.

I am glad that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has put this matter on the record. If I have misinterpreted him in these comments of mine, I would be delighted if he told me so.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure the honourable senator has misinterpreted me. In any event, we had an exchange some months ago on this very matter and I thought I had persuaded the honourable senator—at least to my own satisfaction—that the United States Congress and the United States government, having agreed in a solemn treaty to bind themselves to certain decisions of binational panels, would not be prepared to make outlaws of themselves by contravening the law that they had sanctioned. Furthermore, I think it is a very insulting basis for a question, to suggest that that would be the intention of either of our two governments.

Senator Gigantès: Is the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate not aware that of all of the members of GATT the member that has most often defied GATT decisions is the United States, even though it has signed, and undertaken to abide by, those decisions? The figures and the proportions in the particular cases can be found through the Department of External Affairs or in the Library of Parliament.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I view the honourable senator's statistics and his interpretation of those statistics with the greatest of suspicion. I would have to know what he means when he talks about defying decisions of GATT to which the United States has agreed to be bound. I think the honourable senator's statistics and his use of them merit pretty close scrutiny.

● (1520)

Senator Gigantès: That is an acceptable and parliamentary way of calling a fellow senator a liar. At least I put it out on the line for the leader to take shots at me. I can prove to the leader that I am not lying. It is very difficult to get an answer out of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because whenever one asks the leader a question that he finds at all difficult he simply says, "Go and talk about it in a committee."

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM RE DIMINUTION OF NATIONAL PERSONALITY—EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, may I return to the subject matter that provoked this exchange between my friend Senator Gigantès and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and that is the basis upon which the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher would have made the statement, which she premised by saying it might be somewhat controversial?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Were the government officials of the United Kingdom and Mrs. Thatcher briefed on the Free Trade Agreement? Can we assume that she made that statement based on knowledge and understanding received from officials of the Canadian government or from the Prime Minister of the country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the British have long experience in international affairs. There is not much doubt that Britain has one of the better diplomatic services in the world. In addition to that, Britain has many close ties with this country. We are both members of the Commonwealth, we trade with each other, and Britain maintains, I am sure, a very active and competent staff in this country. It would be far-fetched to suggest, as the honourable senator has suggested, that their information on the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, or on any other important matter in the field of international economics, would be based on inadequate information.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate will use this opportunity to reject the newspaper articles that appeared following the Economic Summit in Toronto, which indicated that officials of the Canadian government briefed Mrs. Thatcher and/or her officials with respect to the Free Trade Agreement specifically in order to obtain an endorsement at the Economic Summit, and it was that information that might have led Mrs. Thatcher to conclude, as she did, that there is a similarity between the Free Trade Agreement and her experience in the European Community with respect to the United Kingdom.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the two types of agreements are so different that it would be quite insulting to suggest a political leader and world figure as experienced as Mrs. Thatcher would be at all confused about what is involved.

Senator Grafstein: I do not mean to belabour the point, but I am not suggesting that Mrs. Thatcher would be confused; quite the contrary. All I am suggesting is that she had information or knowledge upon which she based that conclusion.

I take it that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is telling us that there was some information given to her and she came to the conclusion that the experience of the United Kingdom in the European Community is similar to that of Canada's experience with the United States.

Senator Murray: Once again, honourable senators, the point that I believe Mrs. Thatcher was trying to put across, with an obvious lack of success so far as my friend is concerned, is that free trade does not lead to cultural integration.

AGRICULTURE

PLIGHT OF TOBACCO FARMERS IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO— GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the plight of tobacco farmers in southwestern Ontario, which is particularly apropos since we have dealt with Bill C-51 and Bill C-204.

If I may, I should like to read a short extract from a letter I received from a Mr. Peter Gubbels of R.R. 3, Delhi, Ontario. He writes:

For most tobacco farmers the question of smoking in relation to health is not the issue in question. We would be naive to think that consumption of tobacco products isn't detrimental to one's health. Most farmers in the tobacco belt can accept controls on smoking and a restrictive advertisement policy. I too would agree, although reluctantly, that we need a responsible tobacco policy.

But the fact remains that I make my living as a tobacco farmer. Believe me, for years I have been trying hard to find a means to diversify out of the tobacco business. But because of the sandy soil of my farm, the limited land base and its highly capitalized structure, there are just no crops available that would allow me to do that. Even if by chance I have overlooked an opportunity, the equity in my farm has now eroded to the point that I couldn't borrow the necessary capital to start afresh.

For many of us these are sad times. Not because of the new legislation but because we perceive the issue to be a political struggle between two very powerful lobby groups—the anti-smoking lobby and the cigarette industry. But in all the proposed legislation there is no mention of the farming community. If you look at what has taken place in the last five years, who has suffered most? Despite decreasing consumption, taxation revenues have now increased to 4.1 billion dollars. Manufacturers' profits are at an all-time high. Yet we as farmers have been ignored. Not only are these people losing their farms but they are being stripped of their dignity without any form of compensation. In my own community a number of producers, unable to cope with the pressures, have committed suicide, while others have just moved away leaving their farms to their creditors. These people are good, responsible people. Families who worked hard to develop their farms with a sense of pride.

I think this letter is representative of a great many farmers in the Delhi, Simcoe, Waterford region of southwestern Ontario. I should like to know what plans the government has to assist them with their problems.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as I believe my honourable friend noted, or his correspondent noted, there are and have been programs available for some time, if I am not mistaken, to assist farmers to diversify.

I will take the honourable senator's question and the letter, which he has read into the record, as representation and ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture whether he has any comment to make, and, if so, I shall convey that to the Senate as soon as possible.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO MANITOBA FOR MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the Western Diversification Fund. I understand that that fund was originally set up at some $1.2 billion. The last figures I have for its distribution indicate that some $247 million of that had been allocated—not yet spent but allocated or approved—and of that $142 million went to British Columbia, $79 million to Saskatchewan, $23.3 million to Alberta and only $2.9 million to Manitoba. When one considers $247 million and only $2.9 million to the province of Manitoba, the minister will understand why I have some concern.

In addition to this, though, there is specific concern regarding the kinds of projects the government is prepared to accept. The case has been made in Manitoba that a number of areas require water supply projects before some of these centres can usefully utilize the diversification money. One town in particular, the town of Dauphin, has been putting some pressure on the government to get a decision in this regard, because it wants to proceed with a particular project. So far no decision has been made.

Can the leader indicate whether he knows if there will be a favourable decision and when we might expect that decision? As the matter stands, the province of Manitoba is not benefiting from this diversification fund.

• (1530)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would want to look behind the statistics my friend has placed on the record to see exactly what they represent in the case of each province.

To some extent the expenditures by WDO do represent priorities identified by provincial governments. Senator Molgat is correct to say that in Manitoba some emphasis has been placed on what we would call, in a general way, "infrastructure" and that no decision has yet been made as to whether, or how, the Western Diversification Fund could properly be used for this purpose. This, generally, is the subject matter of discussions that are now taking place and that will be continuing between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba.

Senator Molgat: Could the minister indicate when some of these decisions will be taken, because, quite obviously, some of these projects of infrastructure need a good deal of lead time. If they are going to be started this year, it will be important to have those government decisions, because they will probably not be able to take effect until next summer, at best, if they involve some major engineering projects.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point Senator Molgat makes, and I am sure that every proposal will be considered on its own merits and in the context of the mandate of the Western Diversification Office.

The general question is whether the municipal infrastructure does fit within the mandate the government and, indeed, Parliament has given to the WDO.

I cannot say when decisions will be made with regard to the projects my friend alludes to. That is a matter I will have to raise with Mr. McKnight. If he has any further information, I will be glad to bring it in.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

AVAILABILITY AND COST OF TEXT TO PUBLIC

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, with reference to some of the questions asked earlier today, I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Can he tell us if, within the sizeable amount of money allocated for the promotion of free trade in Canada, any provision has been made to offset the cost of the printed text so that members of the general public who want to purchase copies of the Free Trade Agreement will not have to pay the excessive price that is being demanded? People in my area have complained that, if they want a copy of the agreement, they have to pay a relatively high price for it.

Senator Sinclair: It is $135.

Senator Guay: I am told by one of my colleagues that the cost is $135. Does the Leader of the Government have any comment in this regard?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator is referring to the complete legal document with tables, appendices and so forth. I presume that, indeed, there is a price attached to that.

However, there are available to the general public many documents which summarize the treaty and its provisions in quite satisfactory detail.

Senator Guay: The honourable senator may be surprised to hear that some people who seem to have the time to read are not too happy about the fact that the Honourable John Crosbie did not read the entire agreement. Some people have the time to do so and would like to have the opportunity to read the complete text, not just what has been outlined in a small booklet.

Considering the large amount of money that has been allocated to the promotion of the Free Trade Agreement, could any consideration be given to reducing the cost of these texts so that, for example, senior citizens who have just retired can read these documents in their spare time?

Senator Flynn: Instead of taking sleeping pills.

Senator Guay: It would be advantageous if the general public were given an opportunity to read what is contained in that agreement.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: I shall convey my honourable friend's representations to the Minister of International Trade.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me how much he would sell the text of the Free Trade Agreement for without all of the attachments?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the document is priceless.

Senator Gigantès: Knowledge is dangerous; we must not propagate it. We must only propagate propaganda.

PRIVATE BILL

MONTREAL TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. Michel Cogger moved the third reading of Bill S-17, an Act to authorize the Montreal Trust Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-137, to provide for incentives to assist in financing exploration for mineral resources and hydrocarbons in Canada and to amend the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-137 establishes the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program, known as CEIP.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines announced this program in Ottawa in May in order to provide adequate levels of exploration financing to junior mining and oil companies. With this funding these companies will continue to play a major role in the future development of minerals and our regional economies.

Flow-through shares have proven their worth. There are many new mines targeted for development today because of the flow-through share mechanism. Flow-through shares have brought economic well-being to regions of Canada that, without them, would have suffered economic disparity.

Since 1984 the government has endeavoured to strengthen the flow-through share mechanism. An extension of the period of eligibility to January and February made it possible to claim expenses for taxation purposes for the previous year so that vital winter drilling on frozen lakes and muskeg and movement of equipment would not be interrupted in midstream.

When he announced his tax reform package last year, the Minister of Finance retained flow-through shares, because he knew that with them industry would continue to explore Canada's mineral wealth. Subsequent development and marketing of Canada's new-found resources as a result of this program will help bring economic prosperity to the various regions of this country.

However, the stock market crash of October 19, 1987, has made equity financing much more difficult, and particularly mineral exploration financing because of its high-risk nature. Also, for the mining industry, the effect was more dramatic because of the planned phase-out of the mining exploration depletion allowance, known as MEDA.

● (1540)

CEIP will provide funds for exploration, not just to the mineral exploration industry but also to the oil and gas exploration industry. An estimated $210 million of CEIP incentives will be available annually for resource exploration. That $210 million of incentives translates into $700 million annually for exploration, and up to 12,000 person-years of employment could be created.

For mining companies, CEIP begins January 1, 1989, the date on which the MEDA rate drops to 16 2/3 per cent, and October 1, 1988, for the oil and gas industry, that being the date the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program rate drops from 33 1/3 per cent to 16 2/3 per cent.

Under CEIP, qualified companies will be able to claim 30 per cent of their eligible exploration expenses up to a maximum of $10 million in expenses per company per year, not as a part of the tax system but as a direct incentive payment.

The $10 million limitation ensures that the money is targeted to smaller companies. However, the limit of $10 million is still very generous, because, when you calculate a 30 per cent payment, an applicant can receive up to $3 million a year. This meets the requirements of most small company exploration programs. Although the 30 per cent is certainly more generous than the depletion incentive at 16 2/3 per cent, current market conditions justify a more generous program. MEDA has therefore been extended for individuals at its full rate of 33 1/3 per cent until December 31, 1988, to allow for a smooth transition to CEIP.

The 30 per cent rate for CEIP is guaranteed for two years, until the end of 1990, when it will be adjusted upward or downward, depending on the prevailing market conditions and the level of incentives that appears necessary to maintain healthy exploration.

Mineral exploration expenses that are eligible for CEIP include those incurred on primary exploration by qualified companies that are financed by companies that have issued flow-through shares. These are the same expenses that now qualify for MEDA and can be flowed through to investors. Oil and gas sector expenses that are purely exploratory and are financed by means of flow-through shares are also eligible.

Exploration companies or limited partnerships acting as their agents will apply for the incentives. In that way the government has ensured that the program reaches the same clientele that purchased flow-through shares before and brings approximately the same benefits that would have been provided by the earned depletion deduction at 33 1/3 per cent.

CEIP is accessible to both public and private companies. Because it is designed to encourage new investment capital for exploration, the regulations will be drafted to include special rules that ensure that only exploration activity financed by new equity qualifies. The regulations, which will contain the detailed, technical rules, will be drafted over the summer in consultation with industry and the financial community.

Most investors will find that CEIP offers greater benefits than earned depletion. Payment, too, will be just as fast, because firms will be able to submit applications four times a year through five new regional offices set up to administer the program.

Consultation with industry has been extensive as the government moved to strengthen the flow-through share mechanism. Since May 3, when the new program was announced, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been in touch with representatives of industry, listening to their concerns. In general, industry response has been favourable to the program. Consultation will continue during the summer, when regulations will be drafted and the technical questions arising from our consultative process will be dealt with. I am sure that equitable solutions will be found to any concerns and problems raised.

Honourable senators, this program is designed to maintain a balance between the oil and gas mining sectors with respect to opportunities to raise funds for much needed exploration, and it is complementary to the government's tax reform program. It is market-driven. Industry makes the decisions on where to explore. Investors make the decisions on the merits of the investment opportunity and associated risks.

CEIP ensures that outlying regions of Canada will continue to benefit from flow-through shares, and, when a part of Canada benefits, we all benefit.

Honourable senators, this bill has many technical and complicated clauses, which I submit could and should be pursued by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I hope that this reference will occur expeditiously.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN)—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill S-16, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn).—(Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton)).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am pleased to participate in this debate in order to express my support for Bill S-16. However, before speaking to the bill, I offer my congratulations to Senator Haidasz for the very able and most impressive speech he delivered when he moved second reading. That speech was certainly well researched, well reasoned, well delivered and very, very convincing. In my opinion, Senator Haidasz has performed a real service in introducing this bill at this time. I think he deserves and will receive the thanks of all of us who believe that life begins at conception and who deplore the killing of the unborn. It is obvious that Senator Haidasz recognized that the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada took away the little protection our law gave to those waiting to be born. If Bill S-16 should become law, it will give to those people conceived but not yet born the legal protection they need, the legal protection they deserve and the legal protection they should have.

Honourable senators, it may be thought that this bill is not necessary, as there is to be a government-sponsored bill concerning abortion brought before this session of Parliament. We do not know just what is to be in that bill, but from what information is available it is obvious that it will be some kind of compromise between the views of those who are opposed to abortion and those who advocate it. I certainly do not believe there is any room for compromise when the issue is life itself. And I do not expect that the proposed new act will provide those waiting to be born with the legal protection they require, the legal protection they deserve and the legal protection Bill S-16 would give them.

Senators may ask why I am of this opinion. I am of this opinion because it seems to me that, whenever a moral question is involved, there is either a lack of action or a lack of decisive action on the part of government. And the excuse given for such lack of action is always the same—that we live in a pluralistic society and that great care must be taken not to give offence to any minority group, no matter how small, that is part of that society. Indeed, it sometimes seems to me that more consideration is given to the views of minority groups than to the views of majority groups.

In any event, as a consequence of this attitude on the part of the government, I do not expect that any government bill dealing with abortion will give the unborn the legal protection Bill S-16 would give, or, indeed, anything near that protection.

I believe Bill S-16 serves a most useful, and indeed necessary, purpose, even if it should not become law. It serves the very necessary purpose of proclaiming at this time in strong and certain terms that from the moment of conception the unborn acquire that fundamental right, that natural right, that God-given right to life—that right to be born and then to live out their lives as members of the human family.

Honourable senators, Bill S-16 will serve another useful purpose. It is this: When a government-sponsored bill is made public, we can then compare its provisions with those of Bill S-16. Taking Bill S-16 as our standard, we will be able to see if the government has sponsored a weaker or more permissive bill, one which violates the moral principles and moral standards on which our laws should be based. We will be able to see what, if any, concessions have been made to satisfy the so-called minority groups in our pluralistic society. I say again that it seems to be a dismal fact of political life that, in the anxiety to avoid offending any minority group, the rights and principles of majority groups can be sacrificed.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to quote medical authorities to prove once again that life begins at conception. In any event, I could not hope to be as learned or as convincing as Senator Haidasz on that subject. However, I do recommend, if you have not already done so, that you read the speeches given in the great debate which took place in this chamber on the subject of abortion in the month of May 1969. I especially recommend to you the speeches given then by the Honourable Joseph Sullivan and the Honourable Lionel Chouquette, among others. I would also commend to you an address given in Ottawa in January 1971 by Doctor Heather Morris. Personally, I am greatly impressed by that address. I have read it several times and have always found it to be most informative. It is a brilliant address and is a strong and convincing proof of her belief and conviction that life begins at conception. Certainly, I think she proved her point beyond a reasonable doubt. Indeed, she went even further. She also answered the arguments put forward by those advocating abortion. She not only answered such arguments; she demolished them. It is a fairly long address—too long to quote, but I want to quote a small part of it. She said this:

Those of us who seek to protect the human who is still too small to cry aloud for its own protection have been accused of having a 19th Century approach for life in the last third of the 20th Century. But who, in reality, is using arguments of a bygone century. It is an incontrovertable fact of biological science—make no mistake—that from the moment of conception a new human life has been created. Only those who allow their emotional passion to override their knowledge can deny it. Only those who are irrational or ignorant of science doubt that when a human sperm fertilizes a human ovum a new being is created. A new human being who carries genes in its cells that makes that human being uniquely different from any and every other human being and yet undeniably a member, as we all are, of the great human family.

She added these words:

All the fetus needs in order to grow into a babe, a child, an old man, is nutrition and a suitable environment. It is determined at that very moment whether the baby will be a boy or a girl: Which of his parents he will look like, what blood type he will have, his whole heritage is forever fixed.

Honourable senators, I certainly recommend to you the reading of that address. I am sure you will find it, as I did, both interesting and instructive. I would also recommend that you read, if you have not already done so, the press release of the Physicians for Life, given on February 9, 1981, at the National Press Club. I will quote just the opening paragraph:

We Canadian physicians for life and active members of the Canadian Medical Association count ourselves among those who are becoming increasingly impatient with the unrelenting way those who wield power in our society appear to be moving towards the devaluation of human life.

Honourable senators, that was said in 1981. I believe an even stronger statement could be made today. In my opinion, not only is our society moving towards a devaluation of human life but it has already done so. It cannot be said that our society values human life when over 60,000 abortions were carried out in Canada in 1987.

You will notice that when speaking of this modern massacre of the innocents the term "abortion" is always used. It avoids using a harsher and more factual term. Let's stop playing on words. Let's face facts and acknowledge that in 1987 some 60,000 small, tiny human beings were killed in Canada—probably in a brutal and violent manner.

I do not think it can reasonably be denied that there has been a devaluation of human life in Canada over the past number of years. A great many people no longer acknowledge or value life as the great gift of the Creator. Indeed, many no longer even acknowledge life to be a fundamental right; yet it is the greatest of all rights. Without that right there would be no point in having other legal, man-given rights. Similarly, there would be no point in having laws to protect property or civil rights. If that fundamental right be denied, then no man-given right can possibly be secure by law.

Honourable senators, I sometimes wonder how people react in matters concerning children. Sometimes on the television we see pictures of children who have been injured or abused in various ways. Our reaction to such pictures is swift, sure and immediate. In great indignation, demands are made that these unfortunate children be fed and helped at once. Yet there is no such indignant response to the killing of the unborn under the name of abortion. The reason for this lack of response is that the actual killing of the unborn is not shown on television; so there is no emotional response. I have no doubt that, if the television showed the actual abortion, with its results, being carried out, there would be an instant emotional response. However, when emotion is not involved, when reason alone is involved, then the reaction takes longer, and that is what has happened in the abortion issue.

Those who are in favour of abortion often claim that it is not the taking of a human life. They claim that human life does not begin at conception but only at some unknown time thereafter. I do not understand such an attitude. I do not think it is either logical or reasonable. Surely it cannot be denied that the fetus is the offspring of a human being. Surely it cannot be denied that the offspring of a human being cannot be anything but human, and, since it is a human offspring, it must automatically be human. Indeed, there is no way that the offspring of a human being can be anything but human. While it is customary to call that offspring a fetus, we have every right to call it a child or a person. There is an old saying to the effect that the "more or less" of a thing can never determine what that thing is. It can never be determined only by its size or age. A crumb of bread has as much right to be called bread as a loaf of bread has. A drop of water has as much a right to be called water as an ocean has. A child has as much right to be called a man as an adult has, and a human offspring has as much right to be called human at any stage of its development inside the womb as a human offspring has at any stage of its development outside the womb.

Honourable senators, perhaps I have said enough to show my reasons for giving my support to Bill S-16 and to justify my opposition to abortion. However, there is another aspect of this question which deserves some consideration. It should be a matter of real concern to us when our legal system is used to relax or abolish the protection it gives to persons or groups of persons in our society. Our legal history tells us that our laws have evolved and developed over a great many years so that our legal system could protect those under its care as circumstances changed our way of life. It cannot reasonably be denied that the first and foremost duty and responsibility of our legal system has been, and still is, the protection of human life—all human life. And it follows from that duty that the legal system has a special responsibility to defend the weak, the young, the old, the defenseless and the helpless. Certainly, there can be no one more helpless than those waiting to be born.

I think on the whole, in spite of all its defects, our legal system has tried to fulfill its obligation in that respect. I believe that fundamentally it has been motivated by the noble principle that its prime duty has been to protect and safeguard human life and that all other rights protected by law are secondary to that great right to life. I also believe that Bill S-16, or a similar law, is a necessary development of our legal system in order that it may continue to fulfill its greatest responsibility—to protect human life.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, I oppose abortion because it is my profound conviction that life begins at conception and that to destroy that life is deliberate, cold-blooded killing. I believe abortion to be a most serious violation of the moral law, as I believe the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" is as valid today as it was when God gave it to Moses. Consequently, I fully support the passage of Bill S-16.

I close my remarks by adopting as my own the following words used by Senator Haidasz. They are:

I urge honourable senators and I urge our government to take up this challenge of protecting the unborn human being with unrelenting determination, perseverance and responsibility. This will be our greatness as a nation and our contribution to the dignity of life, the fundamental and ultimate human right from which will flow harmony and justice in our society.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to support the passage of Bill S-16.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Macdonald: Certainly.

Senator Buckwold: You have given a very impassioned speech reflecting your personal conscience. Some of us do not agree with what you have said today. My question is one of clarification on one of your major points. You repeated several times that "the rights and principles of majority groups will be sacrificed because of our concern for minority groups." Every poll I have seen from across the country on this question of abortion—and I am talking now of major, responsible polls—indicates that quite a large majority of Canadians support some form of the right to abortion under certain conditions. Yet the honourable senator has indicated that the law allowing some type of abortion on occasion is a manifestation of the pressure of minority groups. Will the honourable senator clarify what he means by that statement?

Senator Macdonald: I see the honourable senator's point. First, I do not accept his statement that the majority of people accept abortion. I understand that under this legislation there are certain circumstances, medical and so forth, in which abortion is permitted, and that is perfectly all right. However, generally speaking, I do think that for our society to accept the viewpoint of any minority that means that the rights of the majority could be sacrificed. On the other hand, if we are the minority, then we should be given more consideration.

Senator Buckwold: The honourable senator and I seem to differ on a fundamental point, and that is the question of the minority. The honourable senator has said that he does not believe my point about the majority of people supporting abortion. I would suggest to him, and to others who might think like him, that, if he were to take a poll of Canadians across the country, particularly of Canadian women, I am sure he would find that quite a majority of them do not endorse his particular view.

Senator Macdonald: I do not accept the honourable senator's premise, and I do not agree that a question of moral principle can be decided by polls.

On motion of Senator Guay, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the adoption of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, with two amendments) presented in the Senate on 25th May, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, we have before us the report of a committee on a body which calls itself, to put it briefly, Opus Dei. I do not agree with what

[Senator Macdonald.]

Opus Dei is trying to accomplish by having Parliament sanction its legal existence in Canada. It already enjoys a legal recognition under the laws of some provinces, and in provinces where it does not have that so-called legal recognition, licence, permit—call it what you wish—it may apply for such. It is another ball game for that institution to come before the Parliament of Canada to seek legal recognition by way of a bill, for reasons already outlined by our former colleague, Senator Jean Le Moine, and our colleagues, Senator Hébert and Senator Gigantès, who followed the scrutiny of that legislation and of some witnesses much more closely than I did, mainly because I had quite a bit of work with the Senate Fisheries Committee at the time. Otherwise, I would have gladly attended all those meetings.

For reasons invoked by these honourable colleagues and by others, including hard-working and long-standing members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and without repeating what has been said, and repeated before the association of that group with the repressive, extreme right-wing Franco régime—their search for absolute power under the counter, so to speak; their propensity not to accept or recognize the equal status of women—for these and other reasons I cannot support this legislation.

I believe the committee brought forward a very useful and enlightening report. Rather than suggest to this house that all was clear and limpid with Opus Dei, it brought back a report that raised more questions. I believe that still more questions ought to be raised and that more witnesses ought to be examined. I would certainly support a motion to have the report sent back to the committee. We would not have to, but we could instruct the committee to hear more witnesses. For example, I would be interested to know why the Roman Catholic Church authorities in Canada have not come out fully in support of Opus Dei. I would like to know why some bishops accept Opus Dei in their dioceses while others categorically refuse to admit them into their dioceses. I would like to know why it is that church spokespersons, following the recent exercise on laity in Rome, have expressed grave concern about their role within the Roman Catholic Church, which is my church, and why they have raised grave questions as to their activities in areas of the world where democracy is not known to reign, such as in South America and Central America. Strange deeds have taken place, strange acts have been committed, for which we have no answers.

I do not think it is within the Canadian democratic tradition to give the seal of approval to a body which should be condemned for the way it operated under the Franco régime and for the way it continues to operate in many political jurisdictions throughout the world.

It operates en catimini. Nobody knows what Opus Dei does. They say they are not a secret society. The Italian Parliament has examined that aspect. It all depends on how you want to define secrecy. This question should go beyond the interest of Roman Catholics themselves, because these people say that they welcome people of all faiths. They proselytize. They say that they welcome just about anybody. However, they do not give equal status to everyone. They are highly structured and autocratic. They take their marching orders from a cardinal direct from the Holy Roman See and yet they want a licence to operate in Canada, without telling us, beyond the very general terms of wanting to save souls, exactly what they want to do in Canada.

I can understand some of the Canadian bishops, perhaps not knowing sufficiently about them, wanting them to work in some of their dioceses because of the defections within the church in Canada. Priests are hard to come by. Parishes are without their servants. The numbers are dwindling, and it is a real problem.

On the other hand, however, the Catholic Church in Canada ought to let legislators know, once and for all, directly, whether they support Opus Dei and whether they subscribe to the past and present association of Opus Dei with some questionable political régimes. I am not prepared to take the word of the Vicar General for Opus Dei in Canada nor of their legal counsel.

Honourable senators, I will stop speaking at this point, but for these and many other reasons I hope we can come to some agreement, somewhere down the line, to refer this bill back to committee so that we can obtain complete and open answers to many of the questions that have been put in this house by a number of senators.

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TWELFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twelfth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Minutes—committee meetings) presented on Tuesday, June 28, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, many of you will be aware that the Standing Rules and Orders Committee has been meeting for some time regarding the ways and means of providing more information as to the work of senators. A number of you will be aware that approximately every year someone totals the attendance record that appears on the front of our Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and thereby determines what senators are doing, which, in fact, is not a proper reflection of the work of the Senate or of individual senators. Their names may not appear there, but they may, quite legitimately, be occupied elsewhere on Senate business. Therefore, while this proposal is not earth-shattering by any means, it is an attempt to provide more information.

In the Minutes of the Proceedings we would print the committees that are meeting during adjournments and also meeting outside of Ottawa so that there would be a regular record in the Minutes of the Proceedings, and anyone wanting to seek that information would have it readily available. If the Senate agrees to that, from now on that practice will be followed. It is the recommendation of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, and I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators—

Hon. Duff Roblin: Perhaps I was not listening as attentively as I should have been, but I am not quite clear what committee meetings will be reported. Is the proposal to report attendance at committee meetings only if they are out of Ottawa and only if the Senate is not sitting, or is it intended to include the attendance at all committee meetings? If I heard Senator Molgat correctly, it is only to report the attendance at committee meetings outside Ottawa or when the Senate is not sitting. What is the rationale for excluding attendance at the other committee meetings?

Senator Molgat: The intention was that, if the committee meetings are being held, for example, today, presumably the senator will have been in the Senate and his name will be appearing there. It is an indication of committees that are meeting outside the normal sitting days of the Senate and outside Ottawa; in other words, when senators are not available or there is no record of their presence.

Senator Roblin: Would it not be reasonable to consider reporting the names of senators who are not in the Senate but who have legitimate reasons for being absent? In other words, if you are trying to establish the seal or the conformity of senators to the rules on attendance, perhaps it would be advisable to cover the waterfront.

Senator Molgat: Yes. Honourable Senator Roblin, I am very pleased to have your support in this matter, because we are looking at further measures. This is purely a temporary step that we are proposing. We were not suggesting that names would be listed, but simply that such a committee had sat. For example, in the past two weeks the Fisheries Committee had a series of meetings in New Brunswick, and we would list that the Fisheries Committee had met, and so on.

We have further proposals, Senator Roblin, that we will be coming forward with shortly in a more comprehensive report on the attendance of senators. In fact it is before the Standing Rules and Orders Committee now. At our meeting tomorrow afternoon I hope we can make some further progress in that regard. It might be a tentative proposal to begin with, but only to achieve some means of better record keeping.

Senator Roblin: I hesitate to pose a further question to my honourable friend, but I take it that his present proposal does not include listing the names of the people who are at the committees.

Senator Molgat: No.

Senator Roblin: Just the fact that the committee has met. Thank you.

Regarding my comment on the other aspects of the reporting of activities of senators, I reserve my right to give that consideration. I am not by any means offering a blanket approval of what my honourable friend may have in mind.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, that the report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRTEENTH REPORT SENT BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Committee Reports on Bills) presented on Tuesday, June 28, 1988.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders refers essentially to Senate rule 78(4) and rule 80. The problem is that a practice has slowly evolved by which reports from committees studying bills have tended to include much more than the recommendations regarding the bills. This poses some problems for the Senate, because rule 78(4) says:

When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Imagine a situation in which a report on a bill is presented without amendments, but with a number of recommendations and observations. If we follow rule 78(4), those observations and recommendations are automatically accepted without debate and without any opportunity to voice any dissenting opinions.

In order to correct this anomaly, our proposal is that the reports of committees studying bills shall not include background information, observations or recommendations, but simply the report on the bill itself. Then, if the committee has decided there should be recommendations or alterations, the chairman of the committee will make those in his comments on the report of the committee. That will not prevent those recommendations from coming forward, but it will get us around the problem we would otherwise have with rule 78(4).

Some honourable senators may say that we could get around this by changing rule 78(4) to allow for debate. The problem then is that we would be going against the practices of Parliament, both here and in the other place, and against the authorities of Parliament. Beauchesne's is clear in that regard. I am referring now to citation 783 at page 235, which states:

There is no authority that a committee of the House, when considering a bill, should report anything to the House except the bill itself.

That procedure is clear. I might add that we could find no precedents in this chamber, but there are precedents in the other place. On June 13, 1984, there was a report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture in the other place which recommended certain things to the government. The Speaker ruled the report out of order, based on Beauchesne's. There are two different citations. The first one is:

A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the Order of Reference. Bourinot, p. 469.

The next citation is:

In the case of a committee upon a bill, the bill committed to it is itself the Order of Reference to the committee, which must report it with or without amendment to the House.

Based on precedent, we should leave our rule 78(4) alone and, rather, we should establish the practice that committees reporting on bills do not include in their reports anything except the bill itself and, if there are amendments, simply the amendments. All other matters should be done by speech by the representative of the committee.

We recommend that this practice be followed henceforth in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Molgat has explained the situation very well in the first half of his report. In the second half of his report, one of the paragraphs says:

Any background information, observations or recommendations respecting a bill that is reported by a committee may be tabled separately by the committee Chairman and printed in the final issue of the committee proceedings on the bill.

That is somewhat more than the speech report of the committee chairman, which Senator Molgat mentioned. I certainly favour the printing. There are occasions when committee members—government supporters—have been known to oppose certain positions taken in committees. That dissension was sometimes noted in the committee report. If that is to be the way it is to be done now, I can see merit in it.

There might be merit in printing the comments or observations or proceedings in the Hansard of the day in which the bill is reported. I notice that this particular suggestion talks about a separate document tabled by the committee chairman and printed in the final issue of the committee proceedings—not in the Senate Hansard. Has consideration been given to printing it in the Hansard or in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate so that it would be more accessible to members of the public who might be interested in the particular bill?

Senator Molgat: The proposal of the committee is that this would be in the hands of the committee making the report. If the committee wished to instruct the chairman of the committee to ensure the tabling of the report, then that would be in order. It would then be up to the Senate to accept it or not accept it.

Our proposal is that that would be a mechanism that would be available. I am sorry if I did not mention that in my comments. I should have, because it is specifically part of our report. There should be a mechanism. It would not be compulsory, but it would be up to each committee to so instruct the chairman.

Senator Doody has touched on a very pertinent point, and that is the question of dissenting opinions. A very real reason why we cannot have observations in the report of the committee itself is that you could end up by having a statement and then a dissenting opinion. Under rule 78(4), we would automatically be accepting both if we stayed with the present practice. Senator Doody emphasizes more clearly why we need to adopt this new practice.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, may I ask my honourable friend if he has considered fully the point that he has been discussing now?

I appreciate the fact that the standing rule in most parliamentary bodies is that committees do not include minority reports. It is the report of the committee, and what the minority might think about it is really not recorded in that report.

I have noticed in my experience in this house that we have got into the habit—or we may always have been in the habit, as far as I know—of allowing the recording of the fact that there is a minority opinion that dissents from the majority. This dissent has been recorded in the reports that the committees make to this house.

If the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has decided that that is a bad idea and we should not allow it and we should revert to standard procedure, if I may put it that way, I would be glad to hear about that. On the other hand, the committee might say, "We do not intend to have it recorded in the report of the committee as such," but there is nothing to prevent people speaking to the report, particularly the chairman of the committee, and making that a matter of record.

The reason why some have thought that desirable is that, particularly when the government does not have a majority in this chamber, the government minority on committees has on occasion been quite anxious to make it clear that it did not support what a committee had done and would not like to have thrown in its face later on that it did not object when it had a chance. In other words, the minority had implicitly disagreed with what was going on. In order to make that disagreement explicit, the committee reports have for some time now, I think, made specific mention of the fact that not all members of the committee had agreed.

What is my honourable friend's view of that? Does he think that there is a mechanism which could properly be employed to record the fact that the committee's vote was not unanimous?

Senator Molgat: We have to differentiate clearly between reports on bills and other reports. The committee did not speak about other reports, such as those concerning an investigation or whatever. That is entirely up to the wish of the committee. There may or may not be dissenting opinions.

In the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders we are dealing only with the procedure on bills. Therefore, on that point alone, there is agreement that we cannot have anything more than the rules and the precedents provide for. Therefore, the report of the committee would consist of simply reporting the bill with the following amendments, and then listing the amendments, or reporting the bill without amendment.

● (1640)

The other aspect of the report speech would then consist of additional comments. As I indicated, those could be made via a speech by the chairman of the committee and would then be open to debate. On the other hand, they could be tabled at the specific request of the chairman of the committee, and that could be decided in advance by the committee itself. In that way, anyone wanting to express a dissenting opinion could ensure that that opinion was included in the part of the report that would simply be tabled as a separate document, but would not be included in the report of the committee on the bill itself. Therefore, honourable senators, we must differentiate here between bills and other reports of committees.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend think it advisable that this new procedure, which he is proposing for a secondary submission with respect to bills, be encompassed in our rules, or does he think that it can simply grow from experience?

Senator Molgat: No, our suggestion is that there is no need to change the rules; that the present practice provides for the possibility of doing whatever it is that we recommend. Therefore, there is no rule change proposed in our report. We are simply proposing that the Senate follow the procedure which really has been the procedure of the Senate in any case, but from which, over the years, we have slowly drifted away.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that brings me back to the point I was making in my original intervention. The committee report specifically states that comments should be printed in the final issue of the committee proceedings on the bill.

Senator Molgat: Yes, if it is so requested.

Senator Doody: To repeat:

Any background information, observations or recommendations respecting a bill that is reported by a committee may be tabled separately by the committee Chairman and printed in the final issue of the committee proceedings on the bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: It would need the approval of the committee.

Senator Doody: So what we are saying is that it may be printed in the committee proceedings, but that seems to me to indicate that the Senate does not want it included in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. However, by specifically including the committee proceedings as a route of publicizing the observations or suggestions to ministers, or any ideas the Senate committee might have on improving the bill, instead of having them printed in the Debates of the Senate, they are printed only in the committee proceedings on request.

It may very well be that many people who are interested in that particular item will not see the committee's proceedings. However, they would be more apt to find references to those proceedings in the Debates of the Senate of the day covering the reporting of that particular bill. That is why I have a problem with the suggested change.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, in view of the proposed change in the procedure, perhaps I might say something. If, for instance, there were observations emanating from a committee, I take it the committee would have to produce a separate document. Then, if those observations were to be passed on with the message sending the bill back to the House of Commons, a request would have to be made that those observations in the separate document be included in the message. Therefore, there would be two documents, and, if that separate document were not published in the Debates of the Senate, we would then be including in the Debates of the Senate the final committee proceedings, which I think starts to become quite complicated. Certainly, as a committee chairman, I would feel that what Senator Doody is saying would be helpful in attempting to deal with this matter.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, perhaps my recollection is faulty, but there have been some Special Joint Committees of the House of Commons and the Senate. Your recommendation does not touch those committees—

Senator Doody: We do not have joint committees on legislation.

Senator Gigantès: For instance, honourable senators, there was a Special Joint Committee on Meech Lake which reported on the legislation and which printed the minority views.

Senator Molgat: The report to which you refer was not a report on a bill that was before the Senate. Here we are dealing purely with reports on bills that are before the Senate, where a committee is studying a bill and making a report back to the Senate. We are recommending that that initial report must only say that there are no amendments or that the committee is recommending the following amendments. It cannot go beyond that.

We are further recommending that any other observations be made directly by the chairman in a speech here in the chamber, in which case they would of course be included in the Debates of the Senate. Alternatively, a request could be made that the observations be added to that day's Debates of the Senate, and, if the Senate so agreed, then it would be within the power of the Senate to do so.

That procedure is quite regularly followed in the Senate. In fact, I think today we did that for two reports of committees that did not deal with bills. Those reports were printed as appendices to the Debates of the Senate of today's date. That is a normal request that can be made at any time.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Doody: With respect, that really does not deal with the primary problem that Senator Roblin and I have both expressed, which is that very often you find that supporters of the government do not necessarily agree with an amendment that has been made by a committee. If the chairman of the committee is to be expected to report the dissatisfaction of the government supporters in his speech, I think that may be asking a little much of him, especially if he is very interested in the other side of the story or is a member of the other party.

It seems to me that a more neutral document could be tabled, as we have done with respect to other committee reports and bills in the past, saying simply that certain members of the committee disagreed with the amendment, or that supporters of the government voted against the amendment. That has been done in the past and has become a custom of this place.

I can well understand the advantages of simply reporting a bill with or without amendment, and I have no quarrel with that. However, the problem lies in devising a mechanism whereby the opinions of the committee can be placed on the table, without each of the nine or ten members of the committee standing up and making his own mea culpa and saying: "I was on the side of truth and justice in this case and someone else was not." It seems to me that the most informal, innocuous and non-controversial way of putting on the record the opinion of the committee in its components is to table a document during the report stage; that document would lay out any suggestions the committee might have for improving the bill, and/or recommendations to the minister, together with the item I mentioned a minute ago.

I wonder if the chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders would consider looking at the problem in that light, and perhaps have his committee discuss the matter further.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, as chairman of a committee, I hope that, when the procedure is decided upon, an aide-mémoire of perhaps one page can be sent around so that we will know what we are doing—at least more so than we know at the moment.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I just want to express the sentiment that I feel this point is too important not to receive further consideration on the part of the committee. Let us sever the report, as is proposed to be done, and get back to the pure and simple mechanisms provided in Beauschene's and in other parliamentary institutions.

One of the big features of Senate committee work, in my opinion, has been the fact that in many cases, when we have not been prepared to dig in our heels and amend a bill, we have been prepared to make strong recommendations for change. I have found to a considerable extent that those recommendations for changes made in that way are not without some force and effect, and that ministers and others who are responsible for writing the laws in the first instance have not ignored them all. They have been useful. That procedure has also provided an opportunity for any statement to be made about the division of opinion in the bill.

Therefore, I am rather anxious to know whether the committee would consider including that second report, or that the subsidiary document of comments, statements and so forth, in the record of the Senate, because, if they are just recorded in the records of the committee, they are not nearly so obvious, and perhaps there is the danger that they might not receive the attention that they ought to.

● (1650)

The Rules Committee seems to be saying to me: "Yes, it is a good idea. We will continue to allow the Senate to make recommendations that fall short of amendments, and we really do not mind the expression of differing opinions in the committee, but we will restrict that to Hansard of the committee meeting itself." That is not an unreasonable proposition, but I think it would be a more effective proposition if we were to allow those subsidiary reports to be made part of the record of the Senate during debate on the bill. It conveys more effect, and I think it would be more fruitful and satisfying to those who are not members of the majority, to have their views recorded in that way.

Has the chairman of the committee any objection to reconsidering that point to see whether it will command support among the committee members?

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to the idea of reconsidering this report, but I want to make it clear that I am on the side of the chairman, because this only deals with bills. If there is a report on a bill proposing amendments, it is obvious that anyone who was not in agreement would have the right to rise in the Senate and say that, and in any event that would be reflected in the vote on the report or the vote on third reading. There is no problem with that.

The dissenting opinions, when a report is on something other than a bill, will be shown in that document. I do not see any difficulty there, but I agree that a report on a bill has to be restricted to the bill, as the chairman of the Rules Committee has said, stating, "We recommend the bill without amendment", or "We recommend the bill with amendment." Then the dissenting opinions will show on the record of the vote taken on the report or on the vote on third reading.

I concur in referring the matter back for further consideration. What I objected to, and I think what has been objected to by others, is the fact that it should become a regular practice to have a separate document attached to the report on the bill. The report on the bill should restrict itself to reporting the bill with or without amendment. If we want this practice to be continued, the committees will have to ask the Senate to agree every time. But I think what we are now warning honourable senators against is the drafting of observations which take up a great deal of time in committee. That is not the problem of the committee; the problem of the committee is the practical conclusions on a bill. Any senator can say whatever he wants after that.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have just returned to the chamber, but I think I know what is being discussed. Since I did not hear the previous speakers on this side of the chamber, there is no way I can deliberately be inconsistent with their views.

Over the past four years it has been perfectly clear to me that the obligation of the government side is to support legislation. If a senator on the government side does not support legislation, Senator Phillips has an upstairs room where that senator can be made to cooperate.

Similarly, on the other side I have never seen such solidarity with respect to supporting whatever motion is put by a Liberal senator, including appeals on the Speaker's rulings. I have never seen the ranks broken. The only two gentlemen who exercise any kind of freedom in this house are the two cross-benchers, if you will pardon the expression.

As far as the report of a committee is concerned, I think it would be refreshing if it showed who voted against their own party, who showed some degree of independence and was at least respected for that.

We are not allowed to make a minority report; all we can do is say, "Some government senators disagree with the majority." The majority is always the same, the dissenters are always the same. That is a real pain in the neck. I look forward to reading the report of the committee and hope that Senator Flynn's suggestion and Senator Roblin's suggestion for reconsideration are taken into consideration.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I think Senator Molgat and the members of his committee are quite correct in asserting that, when a bill is sent to a committee, all the committee is authorized to do is report that bill back with or without amendment, unless there has been a special instruction.

As I followed the discussion today I got the impression that we are to have in future two kinds of committee reactions to bills, one to be the legislative report and the other to be a second report, which seems to be more on the subject matter of the bill. If we are going to have a second report, surely there has to be some authorization given to the committee to make such a report. I do not think those kinds of reports are authorized simply by committing the bill.

Secondly, we have to have a practice with regard to what is done on the secondary reports. They are often little essays, and a motion to concur is a motion which is awkward to deal with, because one may not like the wording or the punctuation or the split infinitives, and so forth.

I suggest that the only kind of report we ought to concur in, in the case of a bill, is a report to be followed by an order of the house "that the bill be now read the third time", or the like, and that we should not have motions to concur in these little essays of observation, and the like.

My question is: Do we need some provision to authorize committees to make these subordinate reports, these ancillary reports, and what is to be the usage of the Senate when a committee does, in fact, produce a secondary report? These are questions we have not yet answered.

Senator Flynn: A good question!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I would ask why we are seemingly limiting ourselves to questions of dissent—that is, to opinions that may be contrary to the message in the bill. Very often they are what I suppose would be called in the courts “reasons for judgment”, in which observations are made on the nature of the legislation and how accommodations might be made in the future to deal with the subject. We have had such reports in recent weeks, reports which I, for one, perhaps would not have endorsed if there had not been the expression of reasons attached. Surely, sober second thought involves more than saying yes or no and then letting it go at that.

Senator Flynn: In reply to Senator Doyle, any member of the committee, or any member of the Senate, is entitled to express his opinion, as is the case in a collegial court.

Senator Doyle: Is it not something a little more than expressing an opinion in Hansard, which I know is read with constancy by everyone in the other place? It is wanting to convey to the minister who is responsible for the legislation a message, and, other than running across the street or down the hall and telling the minister myself, I do not know how I can express that when it relates directly to a piece of legislation.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, as a member of the committee, and perceiving that we do not seem to be developing much of a consensus today, and since Senator Molgat has moved the adoption of the report, I should like to suggest that the report be not now adopted—I am not making a motion—but that it be referred back to the committee and that the committee take into account all of the opinions, reservations and suggestions that have been voiced today.

We are a hardworking committee. We sometimes get a bowl of warm soup, which is appreciated. I suppose we could improve our performance and come back with a report that would be understandable and acceptable by all.

If necessary, I am prepared to make that motion, but I thought I would put it before honourable senators to see if there is general acceptance of it. As there seems to be, I therefore so move.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this report be sent back to the committee.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report sent back to Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the tenth report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, respecting statutory instruments made by certain statutory courts.

[Senator Stewart.]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I believe I can dispose of this uncomplicated and non-controversial matter in a couple of minutes.

The purpose of the report is to point out that the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations reached a decision that it would not review and scrutinize the rules made by certain statutory courts. At present the Statutory Instruments Act says that rules made governing the practice and procedure and proceedings before a judicial or quasi-judicial body established by or under an act of Parliament come under the review of that committee. The position taken by our committee was that parliamentary control of delegated legislation adopted by these courts is not entirely consistent with the principle of independence of the judiciary.

Honourable senators, I am sure I need not go into the whole question of why judges are different from any other kind of public servant. They are not politically accountable. We think that is a good thing. Keeping that in mind, the committee was led to the conclusion that to scrutinize procedural rules made, for example, by the Supreme Court of Canada or the Tax Court of Canada would be to interfere with their independence. On the other hand, we wish to advise that we will continue to review and scrutinize other quasi-judicial bodies, such as the National Transportation Agency, the Canada Labour Relations Board and others.

I think, honourable senators, that nothing further need be said with respect to this report, and I therefore move that the report be now adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-130—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-130, An Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, this Order stands in the name of Senator Frith, who is not present in the chamber. He is apparently not ready to speak on this matter at the present time. Therefore, with the permission of the Senate, I should like to make a few comments on this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as my name has been associated with the proposition that Bill C-130 should receive pre-study treatment by this house, I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments with respect to it.

This debate has, I think, been an interesting one, and I particularly appreciated hearing from my colleagues on this side, Senator Doyle, Senator MacDonald and Senator Ottenheimer, who, between them, have given us plenty of material to think about with respect to the proposition presented in this resolution.

When the Leader of the Opposition spoke on June 7, he was in one of his more conciliatory moods, because he endeavoured, I think, to be as persuasive as possible as to the merits of his proposition that pre-study was not required. I notice that he walked rather delicately around the arguments he presented in this connection, because I think he must have realized that they lacked somewhat the force of logic he usually brings to his comments in this chamber.

However that may be, I think his speech was as interesting for what he did not say as for what he did say. What does come through loud and clear to me at any rate is that he and his—if I may use the phrase in a not too pejorative way—pliant friends on the other side of the house have made it quite clear that they will decide what the Senate is going to do with respect to this matter of pre-study.

From the views expressed on the other side one would never think that pre-study was invented by the loyal opposition in this house. Its use and its application in days gone by have been warmly supported by many of the same senators who now find themselves prey to some doubts as to whether it is a good thing to do or not. Some of those who sit rather close to the Leader of the Opposition—for example, Senators Frith, Olson, Perrault and other chairmen of committees—have, in days gone by, commended to this house the practice of pre-study. Indeed, they ensured that it was followed in some respects.

However, the Leader of the Opposition, being the persuasive gentleman he is, has, apparently, pointed out to them the error of their ways, and they seem persuaded this time to think that what they did formerly was wrong and what they are going to do now is right.

I am not too sure that that is the correct way to view this question, because the purpose of pre-study was laudable before the advent of the Leader of the Opposition in his present position in this house and it is laudable now. The purpose, of course, was to enable the Senate to consider in good time complicated legislation; to have an advanced discussion or review of legislation before its formal introduction into this house; and to compensate, to some extent, in certain instances, for the tendency of the House of Commons to delay sending contentious and complicated bills to this chamber, usually as a result of the tactics being employed by the opposition parties in the other place. Then, having arranged for the delay, pressure would mount on the Senate to give prompt action to matters that, perhaps, required more careful consideration than the time allotted would allow.

Heaven only knows, if the opposition parties in the other place make good on their continuous threats to thwart the discussion of Bill C-130 in that place—as they have been doing quite freely for the last little while—delay may continue to be the fate of Bill C-130 in the other place. Thus, it appears to some of us that Bill C-130 is an obvious candidate for pre-study, which is a practical system to give ample time for sober Senate review and to respond to the obvious public interest in making the most efficient use of parliamentary time.

I interrupt my review of this matter for a moment to deal with a point raised by the Honourable Senator Hicks, who made it clear—to me at any rate—that he was not averse to the proposition that pre-study involves, but he wanted to make sure that in no case would it short circuit or eliminate the possibility of the Senate's dealing with pre-studied bills in the normal course when they eventually come through. I agree with him on that. I raise the point only to proffer the observation that never in my experience has pre-study prevented any bill, without the consent of the Senate, from being considered in the normal way when the time arose for that to be done.

However, the Leader of the Opposition does not like pre-study. I observe that the tobacco bill, Bill C-51, was the subject of a motion for pre-study in the Senate. Actually, that took place on October 1, 1987. The Leader of the Opposition adjourned the debate on that occasion and he has succeeded in his stalling action right up to the present time, because that item still stands on our order paper eight months later. I just wonder what Senator Frith would have thought of that had he been in a position of authority in this house at the time. He might have recommended the introduction of the Frith guillotine a little sooner than he did, although I am glad to see that he has placed that procedure in suspense for the time being, although he has served notice of it. If anyone in this house desires to adjourn a bill, or a motion for that matter, longer than he thinks is right, he has that thought in the back of his mind. Things being what they are these days, he has plenty of friends to help him in that regard.

Honourable senators, I think we could have pre-studied that bill and done no great harm—perhaps it would have been an advantage. It might, certainly, have saved some time in our procedures here, and I wonder what disadvantage would have arisen had we agreed to pre-study the tobacco bill, as was suggested last October. However, that is part of history. I am not sure whether the delaying tactic involved there would have been as desirable a course.

But even today we have another resolution on the order paper proposed by the Honourable Senator Wood, who is the Liberal spokesman on the language issue. She moved that there be a special committee appointed to pre-study Bill C-72, the language bill, and that motion has languished unmoved from the time she put it on the order paper last March to the present. I am not sure whether I detect the fine Italian hand of the Leader of the Opposition in making sure that that motion is not proceeded with. He may tell me his views on the matter one of these days, but, in any event, I suggest that he may have had at least an opinion on the matter.

In his comments to the house the other day, the Leader of the Opposition, while not backing very far away, backed some distance away from his adamant opposition to the proposition of pre-study. I think he relied on grounds other than that particular opinion he has of our procedures to oppose the pre-study of Bill C-130. He had a different reason, or a number of reasons, why he thought it would not be a good idea to go ahead now with the pre-study. In his statement he said to us:

It may be a case that would normally deserve special exception, but I would ask whether there is any particular advantage at this stage in passing the motion.

At least we have reached the point where we may optimistically suppose that there might be certain circumstances under which he would agree to a pre-study of the bill, but this, evidently, is not one of them. He then went on to give the reasons why he felt it was not appropriate to deal with the bill in this way:

Giving the committee a further reference at this time, in my opinion, will not achieve any additional benefit. On the contrary, it might distract the committee from pursuing its task of understanding the substance of the agreement by calling upon it prematurely to consider the bill itself.

Well, I am a little nonplussed by that, because he goes on further in his speech to say:

In any event, the main point of my argument is that Senator Murray's motion is unnecessary, because we are doing as much in the committee at this time as if we were dealing with the bill or the provisions of the bill itself. The substance of Bill C-130 is the Free Trade Agreement.

Well, that happens to be my own opinion. I think the substance of the bill and the Free Trade Agreement are closely aligned. It seems to me that a pre-study of Bill C-130 at the present time would give added point and substance to what the Foreign Affairs Committee is doing now. In fact, I think the Leader of the Opposition is 180 degrees wrong by saying that they should not go together.

I consider, for example, the study we have been making of the dispute-settling mechanism, to which the Leader of the Opposition referred in his comments to the chamber. I compare that with the dispute-settling mechanism proposed in Bill C-130. What could be better than discussing the general principle of the dispute-settling mechanism, as we are doing, and relating that general proposition precisely to the legislation proposed in Bill C-130? It seems to me that it could be useful to consider them together. And, in the lambent phrase of Senator Doyle, the Free Trade Agreement and Bill C-130 fit together as the hand in the glove. That seems to be a reason—and a strong one—why they can be considered together usefully and productively—not the reverse, as the Leader of the Opposition has maintained.

Honourable senators, I believe that the substance of the Free Trade Agreement naturally flows into Bill C-130 and that to look at both documents side by side enables a better understanding of the translation of the provisions of the Free Trade Agreement into Bill C-130. It is perfectly logical, practical and, in my opinion, desirable that the bill should be considered in the way I have described. But the Leader of the Opposition says “no”, and that suggests to me that I might look elsewhere for the real reason that he does not want to go ahead with this pre-study proposition. His coyness in this matter suggests to me, after observing his modus operandi in this chamber, that the real motive may be something different from a sort of indelible dislike for the process of pre-study on Bill C-130 or any other bill. What he really wants to do—and he is doing it quite successfully—is to maintain control of the process in the Senate. If delays should suit his book, he wants to be able to stall. If pre-study circumscribes his freedom of action, we have no pre-study. We have a demonstration here, I think, of my honourable friend's use of parliamentary procedures to massage the processes of the Senate in a direction of which he approves. His ingenious parliamentary expertise is not to be ignored or belittled; it is considerable.

• (1720)

Make no mistake, the Leader of the Opposition is determined to call the shots on the progress of Bill C-130 through the Senate. He has the numbers for that control. If he says, “Delay”, there will be delay. If he says, “Procrastinate”, there will be procrastination. If he says, “procedural tie-ups”, there will be procedural tie-ups, because he is, to use the Shakespearean phrase, the only begetter of parliamentary dodges. He will go as far as he thinks is productive in pursuit of his political interests in the way in which he controls the passage of this piece of legislation through the house.

However, there are limits that my honourable friend and his friends will impose upon themselves in this debate—whether they agree to pre-study or not. For example, I think that my honourable friend will not call, nor will his colleagues call, for the defeat of this bill on second reading. Obviously, if we are to believe what we hear about the convinced views of the Liberal Party in this country with respect to this bill; if we are to believe that they will tear it up if they get a chance, they have a chance. The first opportunity is to defeat the bill on second reading in this chamber. However, I do not think that they will be so ill-advised as to do any such thing. I think they will allow the bill to have second reading.

Senator Flynn: Not as brave, either.

Senator Roblin: I am not accusing him of bravery; I am accusing him of sagacity. He knows what he can and cannot get away with. He will be guided by his perception of the risks-and-advantage equation in the way he handles this bill. But I do not think that he or his colleagues will call for defeat of this legislation. I do not think they will.

I do not think that he will follow the practice that he has employed in other instances of diverting the bill from its normal channel, namely, to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, to send it to a special committee, or, indeed, to the Committee of the Whole in this legislature. I do not think he will do that either, because there are limits to his tactics.

I do not think he will try to split the bill. That is another intention of his that I noted with real interest. There has been a suggestion that this bill will be split into God knows how many pieces in order to fit them into the various statutes of this country that are being amended by this legislation. I do not think that he will do that.

Senator McElman: There are 27!

Senator Roblin: There are 27? Twenty-seven bills; wouldn't that be remarkable? I do not think he will do that. I think he is probably a bit nervous about the question of the necessity for a royal message with respect to bills of this kind. He has ignored that constitutional requirement in the proposal that he has already made to this chamber that Bill C-103 should be split in two—even though it involves, in the view of some of us, a tampering with the royal message. But I do not think he would dare do it for 27. He may do it for one, but he will not do it for 27. I do not think he will do that. But there is a good possibility that, when it does go to the Senate committee, we may be in for some extensive public hearings. I am not opposed to public hearings, provided they are done with some degree of realism and discretion, but we may expect that to happen. However, we will have to wait and see what he does, because with his colleagues on the other side he has the numbers.

He has the numbers to amend the bill, also. That is something that we should take some cognizance of. My honourable friend has the numbers to amend the bill. I am persuaded that the risks are considerable that he will attempt to amend the bill.

He knows well enough that this bill is not a bill like any other bill in the sense that it is a bill that confirms the treaty. The treaty involves an arrangement and agreement with people who are outside the ken of the Canadian legislature. If you want to amend treaties with a foreign power you must take into account the fact that that foreign power may like to amend the treaty with you. If we were serious about amending treaties; if we were serious about amending this bill in important particulars that go outside the ambit of the treaty that has been arranged, then we could expect that those on the other side might have something to say about their point of view. Things like the Auto Pact, and so on, might well be placed on the table once again, along with some other matters. But I think my honourable friend is well aware—

Senator McElman: Isn't that what Congress is trying to do?

Senator Roblin: Goodness knows what Congress is trying to do! If they try to go outside the ambit of the treaty, then we will have to make up our minds whether we accept it or not.

Frankly, having been to the meeting of the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Association that our friend Senator Balfour referred to, and having been down in Washington recently talking with a wide range of opinion makers about what the American Congress was likely to do, I am of the opinion that in the long run, after a good deal of argument and hammering back and forth, no substantial variations will be made to that treaty which we would find objectionable. But it is a possibility, and I acknowledge the possibility. I simply say that whoever reopens the treaty—we or they—must expect the other party to be placed in the position where they can suggest some further changes in the treaty itself.

Therefore, amendments of a substantial character that go outside the bounds of the treaty and that might be imposed in this house with respect to Bill C-130 will not go far. That is probably one reason why the Leader of the Opposition and his friends will feel quite free to make those amendments. They know that, while their advice and consent is necessary to this bill, if they make amendments which subvert the treaty, when the amendments get back to the House of Commons they will not be acceptable and we will be placed in the position that we were in when we were at second reading—that is, whether we will approve the legislation, warts and all, either at second reading or when our reports come back from the other chamber when they have been considered there. You cannot amend the treaty in substance without opening the whole thing up, and opening up to American counters.

I will indulge in an opinion, which perhaps I should hesitate to do, because of all the unnecessary activities of politicians certainly making forecasts or prophecies is one. Circumstances have a habit of changing; winds have a habit of blowing from another direction, and one never really knows what the outcome of any particular initiative will be. But even if the Leader of the Opposition will not allow pre-study; even if he decides to approve it at second reading; even if he decides to send it to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs; even if he decides to amend it and even if those amendments get to the House of Commons; I predict that this bill will pass in substantially its present form. I predict that it will pass in this Senate with relative expedition after it is received here from the House of Commons. I do not know when the House of Commons will get through with it, but I would be rather surprised if we got it by the end of August or September 1. We would then be in the position of having to deal with this matter with some reasonable expedition, because, if we did not do so, we would be faced with the deadlines that have been laid down in procedures both in this country and in the United States.

We would be well advised to keep in mind that, until that final bill is presented to the U.S. Congress, we always have to have a reservation, because in this world, as I have suggested, things do not always go according to plan. I am hopeful that we will know exactly what the American Congress will do before the end of August or the beginning of September, which is a good time. If that happens, then in this Senate we will have an opportunity to deal with the bill expeditiously, because we will know what the Americans will do—which we should—and we will know what the House of Commons will do, which we can guess.

So, honourable senators, my proposition is that there is really no point in being hostile to this resolution for pre-study. The Leader of the Opposition's mission, I suspect—I hope I am not accusing him in an unkindly way, is to stall without appearing to stall. I am confident, if that is his goal, that it will be a bravura performance, "full of sound and fury" and of parliamentary guile. However, in the end, I have confidence that this bill will be approved by the legislature of Canada. After all the stalling tactics in both houses have been exhausted, the Parliament of Canada will have a Free Trade Agreement, will have Bill C-130, and, if it does, I think we Canadians will be better off for it. Those are the reasons why I support this motion, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable Senator Roblin will deal with a question. I have several, but I shall confine myself to one. Senator Roblin said that Bill C-130 was introduced with a royal recommendation. We know that royal recommendations are required for bills that appropriate money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Would Senator Roblin tell us why a royal recommendation was thought to be necessary in the case of Bill C-130? I am wondering if, indeed, this is a situation where the royal recommendation was properly introduced; or is it a fact that the government now uses royal recommendations simply as a kind of halo which it puts around bills so that people will regard them as sanctified?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not accept my honourable friend's description of the reason why bills require a royal recommendation. Bills require a royal recommendation because of the procedure in the parliamentary system, where the House of Commons has control of the purse. In order to make sure that that control is exercised in the proper way, the tradition of Parliament throughout the ages has been to have Royal Assent for bills that involve money. I shall not get into the technical arguments as to what is and what is not a money bill in terms of Royal Assent, because that is beyond the scope of my mandate at the moment. However, I will say this: the person who decides what bills will get a royal recommendation is the Speaker of the House of Commons. If the Speaker decides that a bill requires a royal recommendation, then it gets a royal recommendation. If he does not think that it needs a royal recommendation, then he does not allow it to be attached to the bill, because it would be unparliamentary.

I have a great deal of respect for the present Speaker of the House of Commons. I recall the way—one that is unique in our history—in which he was chosen for his task. I have observed the way in which he has conducted his office, and he is a man on which I am quite willing to rely.

Senator McElman: It is a good precedent for the Senate, too!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has a point there, but when we get around to reforming the whole of the Senate then I will think about reforming the Office of the Speaker of the Senate at the same time. In any event, it seems to me that the short answer is that the Speaker of the House of Commons decides what bills require a royal recommendation and what bills do not.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I had hoped that I would not have to rise again. Senator Roblin has said that a royal recommendation is required for a bill that involves money, and then he refers to money bills. Of course, that is not the requirement of the Constitution Act at all. According to section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, royal recommendations are required in the case of bills that appropriate money. They are not required for taxation, as is often thought. They are not required for money bills generally, but for a specific kind of money bills: ones which appropriate money.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am sorry my honourable friend did not listen to me as attentively as he usually does. I used the shorthand expression "money bills" and immediately followed that up by saying I would not get into a discussion on what constitutes a money bill or what bills require a royal recommendation, and I do not intend to get into one now. I simply say that, no matter how you describe these things or how they are defined, the Speaker is the one who rules on what does and what does not require a royal recommendation. In this case he has ruled that a royal recommendation is required, and I am quite willing to leave it at that.

Senator Stewart: I think the courts may have something to say on the matter.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, may I ask the Honourable Senator Roblin whether I heard him correctly when he said that he was prepared to forecast—and he described it as a number one risk—that senators on the Liberal side of the house will not kill Bill C-130 and that Senator MacEachen, our leader, will not kill it? If that is the case, what is the fuss? What is the honourable senator complaining about?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, when I made my argument as to the viability of the pre-study, I gave all the answers that are necessary to deal with my honourable friend's question. Why does he not listen to me more attentively? He would learn something.

Senator Gigantès: If there is one member on the honourable senator's side of the house to whom I listen, it is the honourable Senator Roblin, because not only is he learned and interesting but he is elegant in his speech. I wish others would take lessons from him.

However, the honourable senator did say that he did not expect us to block the bill; that it would pass. So, really, what he is complaining about is some part of the process; and he did agree that the process, in any case, would be a legal process. He did not suggest that the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen would break the rules or do anything unparliamentary or undemocratic. The honourable senator simply does not like my leader's choice of process. However, if the honourable senator thinks that the end will not frustrate him, what is he complaining about?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is right; I am concerned about process. That is what the whole argument is all about, and how discerning of the honourable senator to recognize that fact. I simply have to say in defence of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that never for one moment would I accuse him of illegality. He is much too astute to expose himself or his party to that, and I say so without wishing to be offensive in this matter. I believe that he has a high regard for the traditions of Parliament and for the procedures of Parliament. I am simply objecting that he does not want to adopt a procedure which, I think, is expeditious in dealing with this piece of legislation.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—PUBLIC RESPONSE TO PETITION—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the response of Canadians to a petition mailed out, calling upon Parliament to urge the government to act on the motion dealing with the production of the NFB film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, having earlier today tabled my report, I would therefore ask that this order be considered discharged.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my understanding that there is agreement that all remaining orders and inquiries stand.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"*(See p. 3791)CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP*Twenty-ninth Meeting, Key West, Florida*May 5-9, 1988*Report of the Canadian Delegation

The twenty-ninth meeting of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group was held this year in Key West, Florida from May 5 to 9. The U.S. side as hosts indicated that, with the Free Trade Agreement about to come up for consideration in the two legislatures, an unusual arrangement of the agenda was appropriate. Rather than divide into three committees for the first full day of meetings on the Friday, they proposed that the Group meet in plenary all day Friday and that the day be devoted entirely to discussion of various aspects of the Agreement. It was agreed that some time should be set aside on Saturday morning for discussion in Committees on other issues of importance to Canada such as acid rain and Arctic sovereignty and that the business meeting should conclude in plenary with a survey of election prospects in each country. In that last session, after a brief review of the political outlook in both countries, discussion gravitated spontaneously back to questions pertinent to free trade.

If close attention is an effective measure of interest in a meeting, the decision to devote a large portion of the time available to discussion in plenary of free trade was a good one. Attention was rapt throughout the three plenary sessions; all participants followed the proceedings closely and participated actively. Representatives of both sides with experience of several past meetings more than once expressed the opinion that they could not remember a more interesting, informative and relevant discussion.

From the Canadian perspective the attendance of only two U.S. Senators was a disappointment, but their absence was compensated for by the presence of a very strong representation from the U.S. House Representatives, including the chairmen of the Committees of Foreign Affairs, Agriculture and Government Operations, as well as the chairman-designate of the Judiciary Committee and the chairman of the sub-committee on Trade of the Ways and Means Committee.

PLENARY

Agenda

1. Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement:

- Procedures for ratification/implementation
- Agriculture
- Services, including financial
- Automobiles
- Energy
- Investment
- Dispute resolution — interpretation of FTA and review of anti-dumping and countervail cases
- Culture
- Intellectual property
- Alcoholic beverages

2. U.S. Omnibus Trade Bill

After a brief word of welcome from the American co-chairman from the House of Representatives, the Canadian co-chairman from the House of Commons made some introductory remarks intended to compare the different ways that the free trade question was perceived in the two countries.

First, he noted that the Free Trade Agreement was probably the top item on the Canadian political agenda. This meant that the subject was approached with particular intensity in Canada and political parties and the public held deeply felt and divergent opinions. The situation in the United States appeared to be quite different. Free trade with Canada did not seem to be among the top items on the national agenda in this election year.

The second important difference resulted from the quite different dynamics of the two political systems. The traditions of the British parliamentary system with the accent on confrontation daily between government and opposition and the strong discipline exercised by political parties contributed to the polarization of positions and to early commitment to those positions. To make his point, he indicated that he could predict with complete confidence how each member of the House of Commons in the delegation would vote on the enabling legislation when it was presented to the House of Commons; the party positions were already firmly entrenched. As a result Canadian M.P.s had come to the meeting to lobby their American colleagues and, depending on their party positions, either to seek U.S. support for the Agreement or to sow doubt in their minds. By contrast, in the American political system party discipline was not tight and Members decide individually how they will vote. Accordingly he supposed that U.S. delegates had come looking for information to help them to decide how to vote on their implementing legislation when it is submitted to the Congress.

The spirited discussion that took place in plenary did not follow the order identified in the agenda. Furthermore, some items were grouped (culture and intellectual property), and others were either not taken up (investment) or only considered briefly (alcoholic beverages). In general the co-chairmen allowed the debate to flow in directions that reflected the interests of participants.

Procedures for ratification and implementation

Both delegates placed considerable emphasis on the procedures and timing in the two countries for ratification and implementation of the Free Trade Agreement (FTA). Moreover, since it was early in discussion, reference was also made to related issues. In particular, the possibility of delays in the passage of the FTA due to linkage with the passage of the Omnibus Trade Bill was raised by the Americans. Indeed, the Omnibus Trade Bill item was effectively considered under this first agenda topic.

In the lively exchange on these two items, the first U.S. spokesman was the chairman of the Trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, the committee with prime responsibility in the House for the FTA implementing legislation.

He reviewed the "fast-track" procedure, the process that obligated a vote within 60 working days after introduction of the implementing bill in the House (with a further 30 days in the Senate). No amendments would be permitted to this bill which must be voted "up or down." If approved, the bill would then be resubmitted to the Administration and would become law. He thought there was little doubt the bill would be dealt with in good time since both the House and the Senate leaders had committed themselves in writing to bring the FTA to a vote before the end of the current legislative season.

Currently, the Ways and Means Committee was going through the confidential draft implementing bill line by line. No substantive changes in the spirit of the Agreement could be made during this process, but committees could specify or change the agency or mechanism to be used, for example. His subcommittee expected to finish its review by the end of May and after June 1 it would receive what he hoped would be a not-too-different version of the bill back from the Administration. This bill could spend 45 days in committees and then be discharged to the House floor for a maximum of 15 days. Asked when the legislation would cease to be confidential, the spokesman replied that the Administration would likely declassify it very soon. He added that his committee had an excellent relationship with the Canadian Embassy and its staff and he noted that a great many Canadian journalists kept a close watch on the proceedings.

U.S. delegates inquired closely as to the Canadian procedure for the passage of the FTA, asking whether the Agreement would, in fact, pass the Canadian Parliament, what obstacles stood in the way, how the provinces would react, and whether the United States was spinning its wheels "for naught" in view of the statement made by the opposition leader, Mr. John Turner, that if his party came to power, he would "tear up the Agreement".

In discussing the Canadian procedure, delegates on the Canadian side stated that, with treaty-making powers constitutionally vested in the executive, the Agreement could come into force on January 1, 1989 by virtue of the Prime Minister's signature alone as long as the U.S. side had ratified it. For Canada, the Agreement had the force of a treaty with all the obligations that entailed. However, because the Agreement covered a wide ambit of activity with some overlapping of jurisdiction, it was necessary to modify several existing laws, a Canadian spokesman said. The Government would be seeking Parliament's approval for the required amendments by submitting a bill to the House very shortly. While it was anticipated that the bill would pass the House, there would be strong opposition by the Liberals and the NDP parties.

As for the Senate, a Liberal Senator, noting that there was a substantial Liberal majority in the Senate, suggested several possible scenarios: the Commons might finish and pass the bill by the end of July, if it were introduced shortly. As the Government was nearing the end of its parliamentary mandate, it was possible an election might be called in the fall, although currently the polls were not propitious for the Progressive Conservatives. If the Government did decide to proceed in the fall, the election call would have to be made in August. The Senate would not likely have dealt with the FTA bill by then. However, if the election were postponed and it was perceived that the Senate was unnecessarily delaying the bill, the press and the public could become critical of the Senate. However, the Senate majority could declare that it was not prepared to pass the enabling legislation until the Government had received a new mandate and could try to force the Government to an election by saying it would be prepared to pass the legislation immediately after an election if the Conservatives were re-elected. On this point the Senator noted that in the recent House-Senate dispute over the pharmaceutical bill, polls indicated that even though the public supported what the Senate was proposing, they also thought that the Senate — as appointed, not elected Parliamentarians — should not hold up unduly the work of the Commons.

In the event of a Liberal or NDP Government resulting from an election, this Senator thought that there might be a major move by many Canadians to defend the Agreement, particularly since the whole Canadian business community was in favour. However it was realistic to suppose that a new government opposed to the FTA would probably want to go to Washington to renegotiate details. Another Liberal Senator commented very briefly that he did not think the Liberal majority in the Senate would frustrate the passage of the FTA.

Canadian opposition spokesmen told the U.S. side that the FTA was a major issue in Canada, that there was strong division and that there would be a bitterly fought battle. Normally, the Commons would disband on June 30 but the House would almost inevitably sit longer. Further, it was suggested there would be a spill-over effect into the Senate from the hammering that the opposition in the House would give the enabling bill in the various committees. According to recent polls, between 60 and 70 per cent of Canadians considered there should be an election on the issue. At this point, a U.S. Senator warned that if the Free Trade Agreement were not agreed to by Canada it "would set off a trade war" and in that process possibly "destroy Alaska".

On the subject of provincial implementation of the FTA, a Government spokesman said he thought there would be little problem. In any event, he said the GATT was already hitting provincial restraints of trade. As for Ontario and its restrictions on wine imports, the United States had a major instrument of retaliation — a threat to the entire liquor industry. Further, the recent study by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of federal versus provincial jurisdiction indicated that the federal jurisdiction in making this Agreement probably could not be successfully challenged. However an opposition member reminded the group that an important judicial precedent had been established in favour of the provinces by the 1937 Labour Conventions case. Another opposition member pointed out that, in the newly elected Manitoba Legislature, a majority of members were opposed to the FTA.

Discussing the likelihood of the FTA passing the Congress, the impact on the legislative process of the U.S. election, and the extent to which the next U.S. government would be bound by it, a Congressman reiterated that the vote on the FTA would be completed this summer and would not be reversible. It was admitted that most of the American public had no opinions about the bilateral Free Trade Agreement, but, by contrast, a number of individuals, groups and associations were very well informed. As for Congress, an influencing factor would be how the President reacted to the Omnibus Trade Bill which had just been passed in the House and the Senate.

The Trade subcommittee chairman said he felt sure the Omnibus Trade Bill would become law this year, and sooner rather than later, since the Administration badly needed the broad negotiating powers under Article I, 8, (2), to conduct the multilateral trade negotiations. In fact, the President "was drooling" to get hold of this power. Moreover, if the President were to veto the bill he would hand the Democrats a very nice "fairness" issue for the election. Most Americans would find it only fair that workers should have 60 days notice before lay-offs or termination of employment since senior management normally has six months notice. For this reason, the President would sign it sooner or later. This spokesman also noted that most of what Canada had been objecting to in respect to anti-dumping and countervail had been dropped from the bill.

A U.S. Senator stated that a provision in the Omnibus Trade Bill (and in the Agreement as well) involving the export to Canada of 50,000 barrels per day of Alaskan oil contravened Article 1, section 9, clause 6 of the U.S. Constitution by obliging tankers with Alaskan oil to off-load in the ports of another state. The House Trade committee chairman agreed this part of the provision should not be included in the Agreement and that it would probably be dropped "by mutual agreement".

Several Congressmen noted that Congress had, so far, delayed the return of the Omnibus Trade Bill to the Administration. As the differences over this Bill might take time to resolve, and since Congress would not deal with the FTA until the Omnibus Trade Bill was passed, the FTA vote could be pushed later. The Senate had passed the Bill with three votes too few to override a presidential veto.

When a Canadian asked what would happen if the Omnibus Trade Bill had provisions contrary to those in the FTA, the Trade committee chairman responded "the last bill to pass is king." There was some discussion as to whether Canada would be specifically exempted from the countervail and anti-dumping provisions, but the spokesman said only that there was constant consultation between his subcommittee and the Canadian government on these subjects as well as on the dispute resolution provisions.

Dispute settlement

The meeting turned at this point to the dispute settlement item. The chairman of the Trade subcommittee opened discussion on the subject of dispute settlement by noting that the chapter 19 bi-national panels represented the linchpin of the Free Trade Agreement. He acknowledged that when negotiations collapsed after it had become evident that there was insufficient time to work out a common subsidy system he had been asked to make suggestions. In response he had provided the germ of the idea of bi-national panels to replace domestic appeal courts. The idea had come to him in part as a result of his experience at the annual meetings of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group where he had personally seen what could be achieved through candid discussion. He recognized that there were still important issues to be resolved with regard to the operation of the panels such as whether jurists should be paid from a common pool of funds so as to enhance their independence.

The chairman-designate of the House Judiciary Committee was the next to speak. While indicating that he expected the Committee to approve the proposed dispute settlement mechanism, he noted three concerns that had been raised in the United States.

1. Does the system of bi-national panels to replace appeals to U.S. courts violate the American citizen's right under the Bill of Rights to due process? This did not seem to be the case since the existing system of agency determination remained intact and the panels appeared to be a logical means to review their decisions.
2. Since some appointments to the panels would be made by Canada, would this provision conflict with the constitutional requirement that "officers of the United States" be appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate? He did not consider that panelists should be regarded as performing U.S. government tasks. Rather the panels were international dispute tribunals created by an international agreement.

3. Would the panels eliminate judicial review from the prescribed procedure for handling anti-dumping and countervail cases? He thought not since the imposition of a duty on imported goods is a foreign policy power falling within the responsibilities of the President and judicial power has traditionally not been paramount in that area.

Speaking personally, this speaker indicated that he generally supported the goals of the Agreement. Furthermore, in his current capacity as chairman of the Government Operations Committee, he anticipated that matters falling within that committee's competence would be handled expeditiously.

The lead Canadian speaker claimed that he perceived the main benefit of the bi-national panels to be a reduction in the time taken for the processing of appeals to anti-dumping or countervail actions, reminding the meeting that "justice delayed is justice denied". Another Canadian participant suggested that delay resulted mainly from the proceedings of the Commerce Department and the International Trade Commission, processes that would not be affected by the Agreement in its present form.

In responding, the chairman of the Trade subcommittee claimed that most of the problems between the two countries came from countervail and anti-dumping challenges and that within the United States there had been improvements. In the past cases had sometimes been pending for as long as twenty-five years. The Congress had become so frustrated with this situation that it had taken the drastic step simply of eliminating certain agencies. In his judgement the proposed arrangements would represent a substantial improvement over the current practice. It should work effectively because the systems of laws on anti-dumping and countervail were similar in the two countries even though some of the nomenclature was different. It would be possible to have several panels working at the same time, which should reduce delay. The result, he felt would be "a reduction in festering sores, which were generating distrust".

Culture and intellectual property

The discussion of culture and intellectual property was at times impassioned and occurred a day after the Honourable Flora MacDonald announced a new film distribution policy for Canada. It was notable that Members of all Canadian political parties, in spite of their differences on the FTA, came together on this topic.

The Canadian lead-off speaker described how Canadians, no matter where they stood on the FTA, consider themselves North Americans, but still distinct from Americans. The distinctiveness was evident in attitudes, history and the directions they chose. However, when it came to the foreign market share of Canadian-sold books, periodicals, English-language television and film screen time, Canada was under greater foreign domination and control than any other industrialized country. The figures for foreign market share were presented as 75 per cent in books, 60.5 per cent for periodicals, 71 per cent for English-language TV, 97 per cent for screen time, over 90 per cent for film distribution revenues and 89 per cent for sales of recorded music. Comparatively, foreign market share figures for Australia were 50 per cent for books and 80 per cent for films and recordings. U.K. figures were 15 per cent for books and 16 per cent for television programming.

The economic importance to Canada of its modest domestic market share was evident in the number of jobs created — 450,000 — and the $10 billion in annual revenues generated. More importantly, culture was part of the Canadian soul.

The Canadian spokesman mentioned some of the initiatives that have troubled the United States and led to charges from the U.S. entertainment industry and government of unfair trading practices. In dispute have been border broadcasting tax measures to direct advertising revenues to Canadian broadcasters, preferential postal rates for periodical publishers, the Baie Comeau book publishing policy aimed at restricting foreign ownership of Canadian publishing firms, the new film distribution policy and the lack of copyright protection for U.S. television programming retransmitted in Canada by cable or satellite.

Even though cultural industries strictly defined were excluded from the FTA, its impact on disputes in culturally-related industries would be felt in several areas: the dropping of the print-in-Canada tax deduction scheme, the policy committing the government to buy at fair market value any U.S. subsidiary in the book publishing field if forced divestiture were required, Canada's commitment to establishing a non-discriminatory retransmission right scheme by the time the FTA came into force and the elimination of the random deletion of U.S. television commercials on future Canadian cable networks. Commercial deletion would be "grandfathered" for existing cable networks. Postal rates were left untouched.

The previous day's film policy announcement in Toronto set out plans to create a film distribution fund of $85 million to help Canadian distributors in development and marketing and to provide $115 million for culturally significant Canadian films. Legislation would also be introduced to cover proprietary and non-proprietary film distribution rights in Canada. In the case of the former, new investment would be allowed in Canada for importation and distribution. For non-proprietary film distribution, no new investment would be allowed. As well, foreign takeovers of Canadian film distribution companies would not be permitted. The regime would be controlled by Investment Canada. The new policy's goal was to put Canadian enterprises on to an equal footing with U.S. companies and to strengthen the competitiveness and capacity for development of the Canadian industry.

The opening American speaker commented that there was some concern in the United States that Washington was "almost forced" to exempt cultural industries and the Auto Pact from the FTA, the sentiment being that without coverage of those major trade areas there was little of substance remaining in the Agreement. Another reservation was a suspicion that Canadian commercial interests were being cloaked in culture to protect them from U.S. competition. His impression was that Canadian political sensibilities had been adequately taken into account when the FTA was drawn up.

A second U.S. participant expressed satisfaction with the year-end deadline on retransmission rights and the elimination of the print-in-Canada tax deduction. However, the commercial deletion policy would remain an irritant and he questioned whether the new film distribution policy and the setting up of a discriminatory Film Products Importation Office would "fly in the face of the FTA".

A third U.S. delegate interjected that the proposed film policy could serve as a model for similar discriminatory treatment around the world and restrict American access to foreign markets. This led a Canadian participant to retort that the risk was minimal because Canada's situation was unique and would not constitute a precedent.

The chairman of the Trade subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee noted that Congress was not hostile to Canadian cultural sensitivities but lobbying was fierce because "there's a helluva lot of money involved". While the dispute settlement mechanism could be seen as the linchpin that held together the FTA and made the deal possible, culture "could be the bomb in the whole agreement". While Canadians should not be blamed for not wanting more American culture — "sometimes we have too much of it too" — coping with the emotional issue would take restraint and statesmanship.

The Canadian lead speaker responded that any Canadian Government — Conservative, Liberal or New Democrat — would not be able to implement a Free Trade Agreement that did not exempt Canada's cultural industries. "Our culture is to us as national security is to the United States. It's that fundamental to our thinking." As for accusations of Canada taking commercial advantage of U.S. industries, he pointed out that the cultural policy did not in any way exclude American products. It was only trying to level the playing field.

When other American delegates suggested that commercial interests were spilling over into cultural areas, the Canadian chairman reiterated that the Canadian film industry was now over 90 per cent American-owned. Another Canadian underlined the point by noting that Canadian films averaged four showings a year in Canadian movie theatres and accounted for only three per cent of Canadian screen time. This figure prompted an American participant to ask: "What are these people complaining about then?"

"What is at stake", a Canadian Opposition MP said, "is the ability of Canadians to see themselves and their surroundings reflected in films, on television and in books and periodicals. Good Canadian films are being made that many Canadians will never see because they will never be shown in Canadian film theatres. Americans cannot imagine seeing places you know on screen being a novelty," the Canadian stated. "You already own 97 per cent. If you want to get touchy about the other 3 per cent, well . . ." Another Opposition Member reiterated that no other country was so dominated by U.S. culture as was Canada.

A U.S. Senator questioned where culture ended and technical expertise began as far as Canadians were concerned. A Canadian participant replied that cultural industries were clearly defined in the FTA.

The chairman of the U.S. delegation noted that it was difficult for Americans to appreciate the notion of a cultural giant "rolling over us". This led a Canadian MP to point out that, in fact, in the 19th century the United States had amended its copyright legislation to protect U.S. publishers from a flood of British publications, and that legislation had only recently been repealed.

A Canadian Senator joined the debate by recalling that when Canada felt compelled to use the Foreign Investment Review Agency, the forerunner of Investment Canada, to restrict foreign investment, he had not approved of the instrument, but recognized the problem. He suggested that American legislators should attempt to put themselves in the shoes of Canadians. "You people seem incapable of comprehending why 90 per cent (foreign ownership) should be a concern. Americans are worried by 5 per cent penetration of their economy by foreign capital. We're trying to do something about 95 per cent."

A U.S. delegate stated that American sensitivity to Canadian cultural concern accounted for the cultural industries exemption from the FTA. However, he said there was still "discomfort" with the policy and a worry that Ottawa was tackling the problem in the wrong way. He speculated that the new film policy could create an "administrative nightmare" for American companies. "Flora is going to create an awful lot of problems."

The U.S. Trade subcommittee chairman offered the assessment that the spirited debate on culture was the best he had heard during the many years he had attended Inter-Parliamentary Group meetings. "It shows we're all learning." But he added the hope that the legislation should not result in the emotional issue wrecking the FTA. He suggested that the long-term solution to curbing protectionist urges was a healthier North American economy — a goal that could be achieved with the co-operation of foreign investors. "If you've got a strong government you can tax hell out of foreign investment."

Agricultural issues

The agricultural provisions of the Free Trade Agreement was the first item to be taken up in the afternoon session. Discussion began against the background of an intervention made during the morning session in which the chairman of the U.S. House Agriculture Committee had expressed the view that the agricultural provisions would not be the cause of rejection of the Agreement. His committee had been "well consulted" and he expected their concerns would be satisfactorily accommodated in the implementing legislation.

The lead-off American speaker commented that some U.S. farm interests were critical of the Agreement. These included some grain producers who feared that Canadian imports would displace their product. He personally felt that the Agreement protected these farmers because tariffs were not due to be removed until agriculture subsidies in the two countries had been reduced to equivalent levels. He also mentioned the concerns of U.S. sugar producers who worried that Canada could become a pass-through for cheap sugar trading at low world prices. In his view, however, the Agreement had gone a considerable way to open up agriculture markets in both countries without creating major problems for any important group of producers. He anticipated passage of the implementing legislation unless a coalition, not now formed, were to coalesce.

The lead Canadian speaker suggested that the fact that there were some modest worries on both sides was the best evidence that it was a good Agreement. Confectioners and food processors in Canada were concerned, the former because they feared the access they now have to the U.S. market might be cut back and the latter who worried that their share of the domestic market might be eroded through American imports using cheaper inputs. He noted that the Canadian government had addressed these concerns by moving to end two price wheat which had increased the price of flour, providing for increased quotas for imports of U.S. poultry within the supply management system which would be channelled to the processors and by placing yogurt and ice cream on the Import Control List.

A second Canadian speaker acknowledged that opinions were divided among the farming community, depending on the product produced and the region being farmed. He considered that the growth of north-south agriculture trade to the present levels demonstrated the natural advantage of such exchange, which the Agreement would encourage. Unfortunately the U.S. Farm bill had created a new set of problems and tensions and Canada had had to respond with a support program to protect Canadian farmers, especially from the export enhancement provisions of the bill. Canadian farmers were at a disadvantage in the current agricultural trade war because climatic conditions made it more difficult to switch crops.

Responding to a question as to how the United States would respond if Canada were to protect the domestic supply management system by replacing tariffs with quotas, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee acknowledged that the term supply management was suspect in the United States. However, on balance he felt that agricultural trade between the two countries had been mutually advantageous as well as being significant. Moreover, the United States had some ingenious schemes of its own for managing markets and gave as an example the variable tariff on cantaloupe which fluctuated from zero to 35 per cent ad valorem, depending on the season. For these reasons he did not anticipate serious difficulty and he expected that the implementing legislation would not be resisted in his committee.

Trade in services, including financial services

The Canadian spokesman said that the terms of the Agreement regarding trade in services should represent a prototype to be taken into the Uruguay Round. Essentially it involved the extension of national treatment to services of the other country, which was the appropriate way to go since the two systems were rather different. Financial services — banking, insurance, trust companies and stock brokers — have been broken out separately from other service industries. In both countries extensive changes were being legislated to regulations regarding relationships with the financial communities; in the United States it had not yet been determined how far the process of deregulation would proceed.

He noted that there had been effective free trade in the field of insurance since 1903, with roughly equal dollar amounts of business being done by subsidiaries of the other country in both Canada and the United States. About two years ago the insurance industry of each country had decided to lobby for national treatment in the other country.

An American participant responded. He thought that support for the provisions in the service sector was quite widespread. He believed that economic necessity would force the United States to grant more powers to U.S. banks, but there was still some resistance in the Congress. It was unusual, he observed, to give powers to corporations of a foreign country before their domestic powers had been redefined, although the Agreement was serving to speed up the process of change in the United States. He did not expect the insurance industry in the United States to be integrated with other financial services as was happening in Canada because of its large size and effective resistance.

Automobiles

The American lead-off speaker noted that automobiles made up one-third of the trade volume between the two countries. One key condition in the FTA for U.S. auto producers would be the eventual elimination of Canada's duty remission regime. The Big Three automakers — General Motors, Ford and Chrysler — strongly supported the Agreement. The move to allow Canadians to import U.S. used cars was also positive. The main area of concern was among parts manufacturers on both sides of the border. Those who had not hewn out a market niche were concerned they might have to move across the border to remain viable until 1996, when Canada would terminate its duty remission regime based on production.

A Canadian MP said that, while critics in Parliament had been concerned that the FTA would "gut" the Auto Pact, the Agreement would, in the end, strengthen it. With the automobile market becoming increasingly internationalized, requiring at least 50 per cent North American content would buttress the North American industry. By the definition previously used, this figure actually amounted to 60 per cent North America value added, another MP pointed out.

An Opposition MP noted that the Canadian Autoworkers union was strongly opposed to the Agreement on the grounds that it removed Canadian safeguards. However, a Government MP contended that the autoworkers had been opposed to the Auto Pact when it was first established in 1964 and they had been proven wrong. The safeguards had been used only once to make up a Canadian content deficiency.

A Congressman noted that both Canadian and U.S. autoworkers were concerned that jobs would be lost on their respective sides of the border, yet both could not be right about the threat to their job security. But the Canadian Opposition trade critic contended that the tradeoffs in the FTA for the automotive industry need not be "a zero-sum game". Another problem, he contended, was the lack of an industrial adjustment program to cushion job loss.

Another Congressman noted that the devaluation of U.S. and Canadian currencies in relation to European currencies and the Japanese yen had vastly strengthened the North American auto industry. Hondas were now being exported to Japan from the United States.

Energy

Comments on the energy provisions of the Agreement ranged from expressions of general satisfaction to concerns over the uranium provisions, the proportionality clause and the possible future implications for Canadian sovereignty of the relinquishing of interventionist energy "levers" to help future governments regulate the economy in difficult times.

A U.S. Senator reminded the meeting that energy accounted for a substantial 10 per cent of bilateral trade. On the whole, the U.S. oil industry appeared satisfied with the Agreement. As for electricity, the provisions relating to the B.C.-Bonneville intertie seemed positive. The impact on U.S. uranium producers of the lower-priced Canadian uranium was the most difficult aspect of energy provisions. Asked about the unconstitutionality of the FTA provision respecting Alaskan oil, this Senator stated that he understood Canada had already agreed to the deletion of the unconstitutional clause from the Agreement.

A Canadian spokesperson, the chairperson of the Commons' Energy Committee, agreed the energy provisions had been successfully negotiated. Canada's energy exports to the United States consisted of $3.8 billion of crude oil, $2.5 billion of natural gas, $10 billion of electricity with about $3 billion in other energy commodities. This participant described the current bilateral trade as largely free of regulatory barriers. She reported on Canada's recent deregulatory moves and the institution of a market-based procedure as well as the scaling down of incentives for energy exploration and development. Currently Canada was supplying 1.8 per cent of U.S. electrical markets. She noted that while Canada's electricity was generated by provincially-owned utilities, Canadian electricity export prices were based on the real commercial costs.

In addressing the problem of lower priced Canadian uranium, this spokesperson explained that Ontario Hydro was paying higher than current export prices for its uranium because it had contracted on a commercial basis, many years ago, for the mined and stockpiled Ontario uranium at the going, relatively high, prices. Since that time, Saskatchewan uranium mines had opened up with extremely rich, low priced uranium which had helped to bring down prices.

A Canadian Senator commented that the uranium industry in his province was carefully watching both the Domenici bill in Congress as well as the case brought to the U.S. Supreme Court by U.S. uranium producers. He asked if the Domenici bill — which would penalize any U.S. utility that used more than 37.5 per cent of foreign uranium of its total requirements — would apply to Canada if the FTA passed? Would it pass Congress? If it did, would the Administration veto it? Did this bill contravene GATT? Was it in the spirit of the standstill provision?

U.S. participants responded that it was doubtful the Domenici bill would pass the House. The Administration was firmly opposed to it. It could be considered a violation of the standstill clause. Nonetheless there was a problem of how to maintain some U.S. uranium production in the face of the FTA and the low-priced Canadian imports.

A Canadian Senator said the energy package seemed to have been stuffed into the Agreement at the last moment without being adequately thought through. Specifically he wondered whether the proportionality provisions would not cause problems in the event of reduction or elimination in offshore oil shipments. In such a case Canada would seek to increase its domestic oil production to serve its eastern markets which would be cut off. But under the terms of the Agreement, if U.S. purchasers wished to increase their imports of Canadian oil at such a time, Canada would be obliged to sell more oil in order to maintain the same proportion of Canadian production available to the United States as had been available during recent but lower production levels. Any refusal by Canada to issue an export licence would constitute a restriction and trigger the Agreement's proportionality clause. This Senator also raised the question that if Canada were to subsidize the development of the Hibernia field at a cost of, say, a billion dollars, this would add to the total North American supply picture, but "who would pick up the tab?"

A U.S. Senator discounted the proportionality problem saying the more stringent sharing provisions of the International Energy Agency (IEA), not the FTA, would prevail in such a case. Even if the IEA rules did not come into play, the resulting and inevitable rise in world oil prices would bring on the tremendous oil reserves in Alaska which rivalled those of Saudi Arabia. A Canadian member considered that the concerns expressed by the Canadian Senator related to proportionality were incorrect. Canada could, he said, increase its production in an emergency and it "would not have to sell a drop of this increase".

A Canadian member, opposed to the FTA, suggested that the energy section could be viewed as "a bellweather" indicator as to why the FTA was controversial in Canada. There were two fundamental issues underlying the energy provisions: sovereignty and the government's role in the economy. Behind it all was a debate over deregulation and the ability of the government to intervene when necessary in the economy. The FTA energy provisions meant that Canada would lose control of a vital resource as well as its ability to use these energy resources, for example, to cushion the economy against rising world prices.

Another Canadian critic agreed that the FTA meant the deregulators had won permanently. No National Energy Policy would be possible in the future. Many Canadians, he said, considered that the hands of future Canadian governments should not be so tied.

In response, a Canadian Senator said he did not believe the Agreement had compromised Canadian sovereignty. Canada was already committed to energy sharing arrangements under the IEA that were more onerous than those of the FTA. Moreover, while governments could not adjust energy prices, they could, through taxation, raise funds to redress inequities in the economy.

Alcoholic Beverages

There was little discussion of the FTA's impact on trade in alcoholic beverages. One American Congressman said he believed the Agreement treated spirits and wine very fairly. However, there were concerns that the Canadian provinces would not implement the provisions affecting wine and spirits and that European and other wines could pass through Canada into the United States.

COMMITTEE I — TRADE ISSUES

Agenda

1. U.S./Canadian countervail and anti-dumping duties: development of a substitute system of rules
2. The Free Trade Agreement and the GATT
3. Uruguay Round: agriculture, services, intellectual property

Discussion in Committee I did not follow the agenda but focussed on two issues: a comparison of subsidy practices in the two countries and a review of agricultural issues, including a description of supply management in Canada. It was mainly an information session which revealed that even among well-informed legislators, knowledge about practices in the other country was limited.

Several Canadian speakers spoke about subsidy practices in Canada, placing particular emphasis on regional development, a discussion which the Americans appeared to find interesting. For their part U.S. participants pointed to two principal areas, defence contracts, including the increasing pressure to insist of "Buy American" requirements and the intense competition between states and municipalities which led to the "pirating" of plants from other parts of the United States and even from abroad.

A Canadian participant with a detailed personal knowledge of comparative practices in the financial services of the two countries commented that each side has over the years introduced what they now consider to be ordinary business practices, but which were perceived by the other country to be subsidies. He suggested that simply by comparing and looking at these two lists of practices it should be possible to reduce mutual suspicions. In his opinion the subject had to be raised in this manner to the political level.

A knowledgeable American speaker on the Ways and Means Committee noted that the Congress was trying to establish a simple test that would identify when a form of support for business became a subsidy. His Committee preferred the test of "general availability". This led a Canadian participant to describe some of the supports that were generally available to Canadian fishermen that had been deemed to be subsidies by U.S. agencies such as assistance in the construction of fishing boats.

There was agreement among those present in Committee I that both sides engage in providing support to industry, and that each country tended to regard the incentives it provided as justified for one reason or another, while considering practices of the other country to be subsidies. There was also a recognition that there was a huge volume of trade between the two countries that was unassisted and that, looked at from this perspective, mutual trade was relatively fair. Nevertheless, it was recognized that there was a political problem, particularly during a period of protectionism. It was accordingly decided that the staffs of the two delegations should undertake over the course of the next year to assemble information by an appropriate means comparing the subsidy arrangements available in the two countries so as to provide a solid basis for an examination of the subject at next year's meeting of the Group. It was recognized that, although a great deal of information is available, it might be difficult to present it in a sufficiently condensed form to make it comparable and suited for discussion by the Group. For this reason it might be necessary to seek some external assistance and to arrange for meetings between the two sides, both at the staff level and in a subcommittee of legislators.

The Committee turned at this point to agricultural questions. An American opened discussion by asking what Canadians thought of President Reagan's proposal to phase out all subsidies within a decade. In response, a Canadian participant indicated that, while sharing the objective, the goal seemed to be unrealistic. Another Canadian suggested that there was an inconsistency between the U.S. Farm bill and advocacy of ending subsidies. The American response was that the Farm bill had been forced on the United States by the European Community, implying that Canada was not impacted. This observation in turn led to a Canadian riposte to the effect that Canada was caught in the middle and had had to introduce special support programs in order to preserve the family farm, an objective which Americans insisted also lay behind their bill.

Several American participants expressed an interest in learning about the Canadian supply management system. One Canadian, drawing a parallel with studies of the hog cycle carried out a century ago, pointed out that it has been demonstrated that the individual actions of farmers to promote their own interest by increasing their production would normally drive down prices and as a result adversely affect the common interest. A supply management system functions by determining the size of the market, licencing only sufficient production to supply the anticipated demand and allocating only sufficient quota to meet expected demand. The system is essentially a cost-plus arrangement, with prices kept up to the point where exports are scarcely possible. Canadian participants acknowledged that, although the system had reduced agricultural surpluses, food processors were unhappy with it. Moreover, it gave an advantage to larger farms which normally enjoyed lower unit operating costs.

While acknowledging that the United States did not have a supply management program, an American noted that Congress had established a system of marketing orders, which had some parallels.

COMMITTEE II — DEFENCE AND ENERGY

Agenda

1. Canadian submarine purchase and U.S. technology
2. Arctic sovereignty; access to the Northwest Passage
3. FERC regulations regarding natural gas throughput charges

Canadian submarine purchase and U.S. technology

A U.S. spokesman led off the discussion by noting that the President had recently stated his Administration would permit the transfer of U.S. nuclear technology now incorporated in the British Trafalgar-class submarine to Canada. A presidential submission to Congress recommending the transfer was anticipated by May 15. Congress then would have 90 days within this session to deal with it. The American delegate noted that the U.S. had denied such transfers to France, the Netherlands and Italy. However, the President's decision "is a clear indication of our special relationships with Canada".

The same Congressman, known to reflect White House views on a number of issues, noted that, while there were "some reservations" about the deal, "I don't see any real substantial opposition to it". As for buying the French contender, the Rubis-Améthyste, "If Canadians decide to buy from France, that's their decision".

The question uppermost in the U.S. delegate's mind was whether Americans should view the Canadian initiative as being in support of NATO and NATO strategy, or a "non-aligned" or independent defence strategy. A second question was whether the decision was final. A Canadian delegate replied that nuclear-powered submarines were meant to replace the aged Oberon-class diesel electric boats Canada now operated, rather than relying on only a surface fleet of frigates. The balanced fleet was aimed at supporting NATO properly and allowing Canada "to do our share" in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. An added benefit was the ability to patrol under Arctic ice. As for the finality of the decision, the Canadian co-chairperson stated that, although a succeeding Canadian government would not be bound to a previous government's decisions, a major political component in any future examination of the merits of the submarine purchase would have to take into account that "we have to defend the country and not depend on others to do it for us."

The lead-off Canadian speaker stated that, while the decision had been controversial in Canada, he doubted it would be reversed if a minority government came to power after the next election. He noted that opposition in Congress had focussed on holding fast to the longstanding policy of denying the transfer of sensitive technology to other Western nations, the suggestion being that the more other countries have access to the technology, the more complicated guaranteeing safety and security becomes. He personally hoped Canada would opt for the British submarine so that the operating countries "would all be in the same family." An American participant referred to a letter opposing the transfer of technology sent by the late U.S. Congressman Mel Price in November 1987 to former Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger. The principal concern expressed in the letter was how Washington could "draw the line" on future request for similar transfers if permission were granted to the United Kingdom. The U.S. co-chairperson interjected that he believed other countries could not object and Congress "won't give a damn" for precedents.

A Canadian Senator asked if there was a danger that opponents within the Pentagon, specifically Adm. Kinnaird McKee, head of the U.S. Navy's nuclear propulsion section, might prevail in stopping the transfer. The principal U.S. spokesman replied that presidential support for the deal was firm, largely because of the Prime Minister's close relationship with President Reagan.

The American co-chairperson stated bluntly, "If you don't have nuclear submarines, you don't have submarines." Speaking in support of nuclear weapons, he added that nuclear bombs are needed to provide security. With only conventional weapons, "we'd get our fannies kicked in a week." Some type of nuclear deterrent was essential for the survival of the free world, and that should underlie the evaluation of all arms limitation agreements with the Soviet Union. In a colourful allusion, he said that if he were in a room with 10 people and a gorilla, he would not ask those people to give up their guns. And if there was only one gun, he would like to have it. Of course, he would offer protection to the others in the room.

Arctic sovereignty; access to the Northwest Passage

The first American participant, referring back to the submarine decision, stated that at last year's meeting, which coincided with publication of Canada's defence White Paper, the initial reaction was that the purpose of nuclear-powered submarines "was to run our butts out of the North". Since that time an agreement has been signed between the two countries setting out an administrative and notification procedure for U.S. icebreakers wishing to transit the Northwest passage. The agreement did not concede the claims of either side.

The lead-off Canadian speaker mentioned that the debate on access to the Northwest Passage had subsided since Canada decided to draw straight baselines around the Arctic Archipelago and made it known it was prepared to go to the World Court to argue that waters within the Archipelago are internal and not international. He alluded to the U.S. contention that the waters of the Passage were international, but noted that for commercial traffic Canada's Arctic Waters Pollution Act, in force since 1970, had given Canada "effective control" over surface shipping. The signing of the icebreaker agreement "got us both out of a sticky situation". Americans should keep in mind that, while few Canadians live in the North, the Arctic is "a sacred thing" to them and part of the mystique of being a Canadian.

The Canadian co-chairperson added that Canada wanted to be informed of U.S. transits, rather than finding out after the fact. Canada was concerned about the impact of shipping on the Northern environment and native people and wildlife. The political situation could become interesting as Arctic oil came into production. She noted that Gulf Oil was discussing oil transportation with the U.S. Department of Energy.

Another Canadian participant listed Canadian defence activities in the North, pointing to them as elements of a concerted effort to protect Canadian sovereignty. Canada had increased surveillance overflights and naval patrols and would augment the mainly native Canadian Rangers. "We're doing everything we can." The American co-chairperson said that, while the United States had no objection to increased Canadian military activity in the North, Ottawa's assertion of sovereignty over waters the United States regards as international had military implications for American interests elsewhere in the world, where successful sovereignty claims could prevent the passage of U.S. nuclear submarines and surface warships. A U.S. delegate commented that Americans understand the Canadian claim to sovereignty in the North and if the claim goes to the World Court, "so be it."

To underline his point, a Canadian participant reported that there was opposition in Canada to the icebreaker agreement among those who considered it too weak. Both opposition parties were critical of the nuclear-powered submarine purchase and, given the imminence of a Canadian election, the purchase was very much up in the air. "If the New Democratic Party has anything to do with calling the shots in the next Parliament, there will be no nuclear-powered submarines."

A Canadian Senator noted that the opinion that the submarine buy should be cancelled was not universally held within the Liberal party. The nuclear technology transfer decision should be made quickly so that Canada was committed to going ahead with nuclear-powered submarines. The Senator said he was convinced that, if Canada needed submarines, diesel-electric boats were obsolete, leaving only the nuclear-powered option. He stressed, however, that his opinion was not Liberal policy.

FERC regulations regarding natural gas throughput charges

According to the Canadian co-chairperson, the nub of the problem appeared to be differing gas pricing structures in both countries and an attempt to impose the principle of extra-territoriality on Canadian producers. Canada would like to see the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's ruling 256 reversed in the courts and did not believe that it had been dumping natural gas in the U.S. World oil and gas prices had fallen, leading to a decline in the Canadian price. Meanwhile, continuing low world prices had discouraged American producers from tapping new sources or reserves of gas.

A Canadian speaker stated that the process of deregulation in the United States had left Canadians confused as to what the final result of deregulation would be. Once that point was reached, the two countries would be in a better position to harmonize their pricing structures. In the longer run, he ventured, problems in natural gas pricing should be solved because of the goodwill that was being created by the FTA.

On the American side an Alaskan Senator summed up the problem as being rooted in Canada's ability to pass on future exploration costs to consumers through the Canadian pricing system. He allowed that the FERC ruling has sown confusion. However, he predicted that the pricing problem would eventually move from the U.S. courts into Congress. Another avenue was the possible eventual inclusion in the FTA of "uniform pricing concepts" based on the country of origin of the fuel.

Another Canadian participant suggested that the problem would be worked out. As a point of clarification, he noted that the costs in question were included in contracts to cover the amortization of pre-built sections of pipeline. Existing pipelines were operating at close to full volume during the last winter and netbacks to Canadian producers were "reasonable" because of the relatively high volume of gas sold. He suggested both countries should make some arrangement to provide a price determining mechanism at the border.

The American co-chairperson stated that in the United States natural gas now was basically deregulated. There was "unrest" among producers caused by low prices. However, an increase in price to $2 per MCF (thousand cubic foot) would mean that "nobody will care how anybody counts it". A Canadian speaker commented that consumers as well as producers must be well served by any pricing system. However, the system must also provide exploration funds because cheaply available gas was running out. The main concern of both countries should be how they were going to ensure future availability of oil and gas.

The U.S. co-chairperson pointed to a decline in American refining capacity of about one-half and warned that, in an emergency, the United States would need three to four times what was currently available domestically. Although reserves were available in Alaska and the contiguous 48 states, it would take three to four years to build up the necessary capacity. The goal should be to maintain viable producers because, if consumers got caught in a squeeze in the future, they would blame Congress.

In response to a Canadian query on the status of further Alaska pipeline construction, the U.S. Senator from Alaska replied that a more likely development was a Japanese and Korean-backed bid to set up a natural gas liquefaction facility in Alaska to provide gas for export to Japan. While 7 billion barrels of oil had been extracted on the Alaska North Slope, the associated 35 trillion cubic feet of natural gas has been reinjected underground.

With the Asian consortium bid expected this year, it would be "a cold day in hell" before the Alaskan pipe line was connected to Canada. The Japanese investment in Alaska would include construction of a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez, a liquefaction plant and Korean-built natural gas tankers. Such a deal could wipe out the current trade imbalance between the United States and Japan and balance the U.S. deficit.

A U.S. speaker questioned whether the FTA would eliminate the National Energy Board's stipulation that surplus electricity be offered to other provinces before being exported. The Canadian co-chairperson stated that the FTA did not deal with the issue. However, it was expected that the NEB would drop the stipulation. A U.S. participant stressed that the reliability of Canadian supply of hydro-electricity to the northeastern United States would prevent economically foolish decisions to build thermal power plants in that region. It was recognized that hydro-electricity was safe and clean, but Americans still must be persuaded that the supply was reliable. The Canadian co-chairperson noted that electricity from Canada displaced imports of foreign oil and met clean air requirements, as did nuclear-generated electricity.

COMMITTEE III — ENVIRONMENT AND FISHERIES ISSUES

Agenda

1. Acid rain
2. East coast fisheries
3. West coast fisheries
4. Great Lakes water levels

Acid rain

The first Canadian spokesman on this subject outlined Canadian concerns regarding the lack of U.S. action to curb acid rain and the disappointing emphasis by the U.S. Administration on continued research. About half of the acid rain falling in Canada came from the United States and was seriously affecting Canadian forests, rivers and lakes, particularly in Eastern Canada. For example, the resulting maple tree die-back had an employment impact on the maple syrup industry and salmon rivers were feeling the effect. Canada acknowledged it had large polluting firms such as Inco and Noranda, but action was now being taken and dollars spent to cut their emissions. Scrubbers were expensive, but were a necessity to attack this serious problem. This participant predicted the United States would itself be increasingly affected by acid rain.

Two U.S. Congressmen responded, one from upstate New York and the other from the mid-west. Both acknowledged the seriousness of the problem, especially in the forests and lakes of the Adirondacks, in Vermont and New Hampshire, but also as far south as Chesapeake Bay, where acid rain appeared to be affecting fish. The principal states causing the problem were Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan and to some extent Indiana. It was discouraging that no funds had been set aside to cut emissions. In fact, Ohio was spending considerable funds just to proclaim that acid rain was not a problem. One spokesman characterized the U.S. Administration as "too bland" on this issue and the other acknowledged that "the Administration wants to study it to death", although research was clearly no longer necessary.

The two U.S. spokesmen then outlined the difficulties facing legislative curbs on acid rain in Congress. One speaker lamented the imminent retirement of Senator Stafford of Vermont, who had carried the issue forward for quite some time in the Senate. There were two opposing groups in Congress. The main obstacle was the House Energy Committee led by Chairman Dingell. Mr. Dingell had recently frustrated progress by countering a proposal for controls on plant emissions with another proposal to severely reduce auto emissions in California, a move which marshalled opposition and led to a stalemate. However, the mid-west spokesman judged that the environmentalists were trying to get too much all at once and this meant no bill could even get out of the committee stage.

Dialogues between the two governments on this issue had got nowhere. Nor had the two envoys' report. The U.S. spokesman suggested that one approach would be the organization by the Centre for Legislative Exchange in Ottawa of direct lobbying of Congress by Canadian parliamentarians. The first U.S. spokesman agreed that this was worth a try and suggested that the focus of such lobbying should be on Congressman Waxman's Health and Environment subcommittee of the House Energy Committee. Congressman Sikorski of Minnesota, on this subcommittee, was also mentioned. About nine members of this Committee were trying to get a middle position and it would be important to try to identify how three or four more votes could be changed. He suggested that the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Mr. de la Garza should also be presented with the damage statistics and it would be important as well to see the chairmen of subcommittees and ranking members. Alternatively or additionally key Congressional figures could be invited to Canada.

A second Canadian delegate told the U.S. side that, unlike in the United States, political support in Canada for acid rain reduction was quite strong. While significant decreases were already achieved and would be achieved in Canadian emissions, U.S. emissions remained high and the great damage has been inflicted. It was estimated that in Quebec alone, 2 million taps on maple trees were no longer viable, 15,000 Canadian lakes were dead (of which 7,000 were in Ontario), while 150,000 more were in "acid shock". He explained that the sudden impact of melting snow in the spring released the heavy build-up of sulphur dioxide (SO₂) and nitrogen oxide (NO_x) which had accumulated on the snow over the winter with a consequent traumatic shock on plant and water life in Canada. Further, a new study had catalogued the millions being lost through coniferous and deciduous trees die-off.

This spokesman continued that the Canadian action implementing a 50 per cent reduction in 1980 levels by 1994 meant an objective of a maximum loading limit of 18 lbs per acre in the Laurentians. Establishing a targetable level of lower emissions was important. Another approach might be court action and he cited the landmark case of 40 years ago when Washington and Oregon had successfully brought suit against the Trail Smelter Company of British Columbia. He wondered whether there should be a Canadian suit brought in the east, although he recognized there could be some difficulty in distinguishing the plumes from U.S. and Canadian plants as they became integrated at high altitudes.

This delegate then asked if the U.S. Congressman could explain why the Administration had not taken any action against states which were major sources of transboundary air pollution since Section 115 of the U.S. Clean Air Act gave the EPA Administrator specific authority to take action against such states. Has Congress no power to force him to implement this legislation, he asked? In response, a Congressman suggested that one way to raise the issue would be for a letter to go to Lee Thomas signed by 100 Congressmen. However, the New York State Congressman undertook to speak directly to the EPA Administrator if the Canadian side would send him a letter requesting information on this matter.*

A Canadian delegate made the point that, while scrubbers and other abatement measures were extremely costly — some were saying it would amount to $6,000 for every pound of fish saved — it was important to recognize that otherwise the present generation would leave an untenable environment for their children and grandchildren. Another Canadian mentioned that there were currently studies suggesting that human health could be affected by acid rain. A third Canadian pressed for urgent U.S. action, saying that the denuding effect around Sudbury from emissions could be compared to the Agent Orange effect. Even with additives to the soil, after many years it was still difficult to grow grass on this blighted ground. He added that, while in some farming areas it was possible to buffer the effects of acid rain through the addition of lime, this was not possible on the Laurentian shield area. Inco, the cause of the denuding effect was now, at its own expense, making an enormous reduction in its emissions and was away ahead of the schedule fixed by federal-provincial agreement. Inco has spent $50 million on research to contain SO₂ levels and one facet of its operations was even earning them money. Noranda, which could not absorb the whole cost, was receiving some federal and provincial funds to assist its clean-up.

* The Canadian delegation agreed and a letter was sent to the Congressman.

East coast fisheries

The initial Canadian spokesman on this topic stressed the need for Canada and the United States to take a cooperative approach toward management of the east coast fish stocks. The most serious problem recently involved excessive fishing by American fishermen beyond the 200 mile limit, particularly on the "Tail" of the Grand Banks off Newfoundland. The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) has tried to manage this area, but the United States was not a NAFO member and was pursuing completely unregulated fishing activities. The Europeans also were abusing their NAFO quotas. Spawning and breeding took place in this area and fishing must be controlled or diminished takes would inevitably result. In the interests of stocks management the United States should become a member of NAFO, this spokesman urged. A lot of money, perhaps $1 billion, was involved in fish exports from Atlantic Canada.

Seals were also contributing to diminishing fish stocks, continued this member. Due to the termination of the seal pup hunt the seal population was growing rapidly. It was estimated that each year an adult seal ate one tonne of fish. The problem was affecting the west coast as well. Another Canadian noted that cod stocks were being contaminated by the seals and this could present marketing problems. There was no possibility of renewing the hunt or even culling the seals due to the international impact created by Greenpeace, the European Parliament and the media distortions.

Canadian participants noted that Canada had foregone plans to drill for oil and natural gas off Georges Bank in response to opposition by U.S. and Canadian fishermen. A new Canadian government policy banned oil exploration until at least the year 2000. U.S. interests had drilled 10 wells on its side of Georges Bank but had found nothing. However, a U.S. Senator discounted environmental concerns over oil drilling, commenting that off the Louisiana coast the fish seemed more plentiful now than before the oil rigs moved in. Even with a 'worst case' spill scenario such as happened in Cook Inlet last year, there had been a costly clean-up but no lasting effects. As for the expansion in the mammals' population, this was presenting a real problem for fish stocks of both countries.

Even the Alaskan hunt of male seals was affected by the end of the Canadian whitecoat kill. More fur seals were now dying from malnutrition than were previously harvested. But environmentalists were the strongest political force in the United States today and they were unassailable. A long-term program was needed to restore ocean fisheries, but he predicted that groundfish fish farming will take over from natural fish. In any case there was no fish supply problem, fish prices were going down and there was not a calamity situation.

A west coast member said that seals had been penetrating as far as 50 miles up several salmon rivers on the west coast and this would certainly affect certain salmon species. The U.S. Senator from Alaska agreed and noted that Beluga whales could devastate a salmon run as the salmon came down to river mouth in spring.

West coast fisheries

Strong criticism was voiced by the Alaskan Senator of Canada's new landing requirements' policy for west coast salmon and herring announced after the recent GATT panel ruling. He said 10 Seattle fishing companies were bringing a private action and Clayton Yeutter had said he would appeal the new policy at the GATT Council in Geneva as a violation of GATT rules. Any quality inspection requirement would mean handling delays which would inevitably lead to immediate processing and an end to exports of unprocessed fish. The policy was clearly a violation of traditional practices. Moreover it would destroy the cross-fishing that took place including Canadian fishermen operating off the Alaskan coast.

This spokesman predicted that retaliatory measures would be taken. The United States would fish heavily on the east coast beyond the 200 mile limit, or it would impose landing requirements for fish taken off Alaska. More than one-half of the west coast Canadian fishing fleet was in Alaskan waters at some periods of the year. On the east coast, the minimum size requirements for Canadian lobsters landed in New England markets would be raised. The U.S. Senator estimated that the new west coast Canadian requirements would cost U.S. fishermen losses of $40 to $100 million. If Canada persists in these west coast barriers, it could lead to trade sanctions, and to retaliations equal in volume.

Responding to a question as to the origins of the dispute, a Canadian west coast member recounted that the case had been instigated by U.S. fishermen under Section 301 and had subsequently shifted to GATT. The problem lay with huge freezer ships that could fish 24 hours a day and stay out for 7 or 8 months at a time. What was happening was that sockeye salmon would be taken by Canadian fishermen and be delivered to Seattle from whence it was shipped to Tokyo, the biggest exchange. He noted that when Alaskan fishermen had big runs of pink salmon they contacted Prince Rupert processors who operated shorter runs at lower costs. In fact, approximately 15 per cent of B.C. fish packaging were estimated to come from Alaskan overflows.

An east coast Canadian spokesman urged that no linkage be made to the east coast fisheries. "If it isn't broken, don't fix it" he said. While Canadian lobster sizes had varied from different areas, the original Canadian standards for scallops had been larger than those required in Gloucester, Mass. Other Canadian members protested the idea of U.S. retaliation in respect to east coast fisheries, and suggested it would be difficult to enforce. But the Alaskan Senator insisted that Canadian fish could be cut off from Boston, its major market. The Canadian measure was not a conservation measure but a trade restriction, he insisted.

Great Lakes water levels

This topic was put on the agenda at the last moment by two Congressmen from districts in upstate New York bordering on Lake Ontario who were perturbed by the present very low water levels of Lake Ontario. The International Joint Commission (IJC) was responsible for maintaining Great Lakes levels, although it was admitted that they were very difficult to control, said one spokesman. In recent years the levels had been too high, but last December, expecting high levels again, the U.S. Corps of Engineers had pushed too much water through the St. Lawrence. When rainfall levels fell the result was that marinas, boating interests and those with cottages and homes on the shore were in difficulties as to how to get their boats in the water. Admittedly, there were conflicting opinions between commercial shipping interests, power interests, pleasure craft and cottagers. In Ogdensburg, said the other U.S. spokesman the water was at the lowest ever recorded level, 17 inches lower on April 1 this year than on the same date last year. He urged that members of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group point out to the relevant agencies, the IJC, the power authorities and the Seaway authorities, the serious economic effects of these low levels, and put pressure on them so they would "hear the protest". It was not good enough for them to say "the levels would average out over the long term".

A Canadian member reminded the Americans that the IJC was, under a 1986 reference, now studying the problem of both high and low levels and would be reporting in two stages in 1989 and 1991. While Lake Ontario was experiencing low levels, it should be remembered that some of the upper lakes were still at high levels, this member said. If anything were done to restrict the flow out in these areas it would cause great difficulties in the upper system.

The second U.S. spokesman was not optimistic about the IJC study nor that the 1991 report would provide any answers. He called for "a little common sense" to raise the levels at least 6 to 8 inches. It would take about two to three weeks to back the water up. The IJC needed to be sensitized.

Another Canadian from the Lake St. Francis area said marinas in his riding were also complaining about low levels, about 6 inches lower than average, he suggested rounding up a dozen M.P.s and Congressmen whose ridings front on the Kingston-Cornwall area to get together to discuss the problem and to formulate a joint letter to the IJC. This idea seemed to be acceptable to the participants.

An American asked why the water could not be sent down the system faster. A Canadian member said he had read an explanation of the low levels in Lake Ontario — which he did not necessarily accept — to the effect that the current low water difficulties along the shore were related to currents created by higher than normal outflow from the effort to reduce the excess of previous years in the upper lakes.

The U.S. delegate reiterated that some action needed to be taken by parliamentarians to sensitize the authorities in order to get some fast relief.

CONCLUDING PLENARY

The topic for the final plenary was the elections in the two countries. The U.S. delegation reviewed some of the prospects of the candidates and likely developments in the U.S. race, while the Canadians explained the uncertain timing associated with a Canadian election, the volatility of the electorate and some of the likely election issues.

It was a measure of the interest of the U.S. delegation in the Free Trade Agreement that the final plenary discussion reverted fairly quickly to that question once again.

The U.S. chairman of Trade subcommittee warned the Canadians what could happen if Canada turned the FTA down. The Agreement was not perfect but it was fair, it was not lopsided, he said. If Canada decided to stand alone, well and good, but there would be no going back to the status quo ante. On the other hand, a lot of issues that had been festering for years had lain dormant or been subdued because of the "wonderful relationship" that existed and because an Agreement was gradually evolving. He himself, as chairman of the Trade subcommittee, had been "sitting on hundreds of pieces of protectionist legislation" which would be very painful for Canada. If they reached the floor of the House, they would be likely to pass, he asserted. It would be years before the damage could be rectified, if the FTA were cast aside. If it came into effect, it could always be improved through renegotiations later, he said. A U.S. Senator added that the U.S. system would be shocked by a Canadian rejection of the FTA and the effect would be unpredictable. However, if the bilateral agreement worked it could be a world "trend setter".

Canadian delegates gave a variety of opinions as to the strength of Canadian support for or against the Agreement. A Canadian assured the U.S. delegates that — even if the present government were changed in an election — if the FTA were in place, it was a long tradition that agreements made by previous governments were honoured by succeeding governments.

Another Canadian opposition participant said he took the warning of the U.S. Trade Committee chairman extremely seriously. The softwood lumber case had pointed to the need for an improved method of dealing with countervail and anti-dumping cases. If his party were to become the government or were in a position of power after the election, there would be a need for some renegotiation of the Agreement.

One Canadian participant pointed out that, although he personally thought the FTA would be a win-win situation for both countries, inevitably there would be some losers. Unfortunately, bad news always gets the most attention. In assessing the FTA, Canadians were going to ask, "was it a fair deal?" In a way, the U.S. acid rain policy would be a test of that fairness. Acid rain would be an election issue in Canada. If Canadians considered that the United States did not treat Canada fairly on acid rain, it could affect the government's selling of the FTA as "a fair deal".

In response, U.S. members reiterated what several had already stated in Committee III, that they were frustrated because it was impossible to get the acid rain issue on the floor of the House of Representatives. In the Senate, both Senators Byrd and Baker, who are two dominant figures representing coal producing states, have resisted efforts to control emissions. If Senator Mitchell of Maine, a supporter of curbs on acid rain, were to become the new majority leader on Senator Byrd's retirement from that office, the situation might change. But they did not offer the hope of any progress until after the next U.S. election.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY ON REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED
 "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TUESDAY, July 5, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

During study of the enquiry of the Honourable Senator Jack Marshall with respect to the National Film Board production, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and Senior Citizens of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology received important new information about the relationship which existed between Air Marshal William Avery Bishop and his wartime mechanic, Walter "Freddie" Bourne as well as new information about the flight characteristics of the aircraft which Bishop flew during World War I.

In the early 1950s, Walter "Freddie" Bourne wrote a 20-page essay in the form of a letter to Wesley Rogers, son of his close friend Winnie Rogers. This letter gives some indication of Bourne's wide range of interests, for it includes comments on the history of the native peoples of North America, a description of England, its school system, labour laws, etc., and a brief but significant account of his activities during World War I. This latter section deals with the wartime career of Bishop and their continuing contacts thereafter. It is very clear that as late as the 1950s, Walter Bourne had no doubts or reservations about the integrity of Bishop's wartime record or his reputation as the "Deadliest Air Ace" of the world wars. The letter also illustrates the close relationship between pilot and mechanic - in the case of Bourne and Bishop, a relationship based on extraordinary trust, faith and respect, because the mechanic holds his pilot's life in his hands every day and every hour that the plane is in the air. This throws additional discredit on the filmmaker's use of the character of Walter "Freddie" Bourne to attack Bishop's integrity and reputation.

"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" suggests that Bishop landed his aircraft, a Nieuport 17, removed the Lewis machine gun mounted on the upper wing and fired a number of rounds into its tail assembly, to fake his attack on a German airfield, for which he was awarded the Victoria Cross. R.W. Bradford, Associate Director of the National Aviation Museum of Canada wrote the Subcommittee to offer expert opinion on three things:

- (1) technicalities of landing a Nieuport 17 and taking off again without assistance;
- (2) the damage suffered by the aircraft as reported by his Flight Commander; and

- (3) the question of the missing gun.

His conclusions are simple and straightforward. While it was easy to land a Nieuport unassisted, it was next to impossible to take off without assistance because without ground crew to restrain it, the airplane would either run away on its own or stand on its nose. Hence Bishop could not have simply landed, carefully shot up his plane, and then taken off again - he would have had to find an isolated landing field and then find assistance to help him take off - a highly improbable hypothesis. The damage to Bishop's plane, as reported by his superiors, could have been repaired "within a few hours." Thirdly, the Lewis gun could be removed and jettisoned in the air without much difficulty.

Mr. Bradford's opinions are authoritative, not speculative or remembered long after the event, because they can readily be confirmed. The National Aviation Museum has in its collection a Nieuport 17, equipped as Bishop's was 70 years ago. The museum's plane still flies in air shows and is repaired the same way as Bishop's would have been after his mission.

An extract from Bourne's essay and the text of Mr. Bradford's letter are reprinted as appendices to this Report, as are letters to the Subcommittee and the Prime Minister from Walter Bourne's daughter. While this information, if it had been available at the time, would not have changed the general tenor of our first Report to the Senate, it would have reinforced its conclusions and the desire of your Committee to see a more forthright disclaimer attached to "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" than the one adopted by the National Film Board:

THE FILM YOU ARE ABOUT TO SEE IS A DOCU-DRAMA.
 IT IS A PERSPECTIVE ON THE NATURE OF HEROISM AND THE LEGEND OF BILLY BISHOP.
 IT CONTAINS BOTH ACTUAL DOCUMENTARY FOOTAGE AND DRAMATIZED SEGMENTS.

An acceptable compromise on the wording of a new disclaimer was agreed upon and the conclusion to the study of Senator Marshall's enquiry was embodied in an exchange of letters. In these letters it was agreed that the disclaimer would be worded as follows:

This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be a biography of Billy Bishop. Certain characters have been used to express certain doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the actual characters.

The National Film Board assured the Subcommittee that this disclaimer would be placed at the beginning of the film immediately after the National Film Board logo and that Col. A.J. Bauer would be called upon as a consultant during production filming of the new film.

Your Committee is also pleased to report that the director of the new film on the life and career of Billy Bishop has expressed an interest in meeting with members of the Subcommittee.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR TREMBLAY
Chairman

The Honourable Jack Marshall, C.D.
Room 804-VB
Senate of Canada
Ottawa

Dear Sir,

Enclosed you will find a copy of the letter I have sent to your Prime Minister explaining my interest in the debate at present centred around the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". I have read with interest the reports sent to me by Mr. Wesley Rogers, of your part in the Senate Debates of October 27th, 28th and November 5th but admit to being rather puzzled on two points.

In his own account of the single-handed attack on an enemy airfield in the early hours of June 2nd, written in his book "Winged Warfare" Billy Bishop says he did not know where the airfield he attacked was, as the one he had set out to attack had been deserted and he came upon this one by chance. If the film company have stated that the attack took place at Estournel does this mean that the records show an airfield there being attacked at that time in the way Billy Bishop describes?

Secondly, in his own account, no mention is made of gun being ditched before arriving back at base. Of the plane he writes "Everywhere it was shot about, bullet-holes being in almost every part of it, although none, luckily, within two feet of where I sat. Parts of the machine were so badly damaged as to take a lot of repairing; but I used the same patched planes in the machine for some time afterwards, and always felt great affection for it for pulling me through such a successful enterprise". Surely he would not damage his own plane to this extent and then risk flying it home, and, could he risk writing an untrue account so publicly while his contemporaries were alive to challenge his report?

He also continued "I personally congratulated the man (my father) who had charge of my gun, suddenly realising that if it had jammed at a critical moment what a tight corner I would have been in" I find it strange that no mention was made here of ditching the gun.

I am in no position to judge Billy Bishop but I know my father was an intelligent man, a man of integrity. He thought most highly of him until his death and it would have broken his heart to think that his character could be used to utter such defamatory remarks. I would be grateful if you could have this slur on his memory removed.

Yours sincerely,

(Mrs.) L. Foster

Prime Minister
Brian Mulroney

Dear Sir,

I have received from Mr. Wesley Rogers of Thunder Bay, Ontario, copies of part of the script for the National Film Board of Canada film entitled: "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". Also in the same package were copies of speeches concerning this film, made by the Honourable Senator Jack Marshall C.D. in the Senate on October 27th, 28th and November 5th.

My father, "Freddie" Bourne was Billy Bishop's mechanic during the First World War. This fact never ceased to fill him with pride and I still have in my possession a telegram and a letter sent to my father in 1930 and 1942 from Mr. Bishop which he treasured until his death in 1956. He maintained contact with the Bishop family and was delighted just before he died, to hear that he would be portrayed in a film to be made about his hero. That film was never made as Billy Bishop died a few months later.

I appreciate the efforts being made by many Canadians to remove this slur that has been cast upon one of your war heroes and I will willingly assist in any way possible but I would also like to make another point.

My father was an intelligent, articulate man who fought for his country in two World Wars and lost both his legs. This film portrays him in an entirely different way and makes him utter remarks contrary to anything he would ever express. This is a terrible desecration of my father's memory and on behalf of the Canadian people I trust you will do everything in your power to see that this wrong is righted.

Yours sincerely

(Mrs.) L. Foster.

National Museum of Science and Technology
National Aviation Museum

15 October 1987

Dear Senator Marshall,

I am taking the liberty of writing to you to express my thoughts regarding the significant factors that may not have been fully explored in the controversy surrounding the NFB film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

My main concern is regarding the film's suggestion that Billy Bishop landed his Nieuport 17, removed the Lewis machine gun mounted on the upper wing and fired a number of rounds into the tail assembly of his aircraft. It seems to be suggested that he then threw the gun away and took off again. I would like to comment on three things:

- 1) Technicalities of landing this type of aircraft and taking off again without assistance;
- 2) the damage suffered by the aircraft as reported by his Flight Commander; and
- 3) the question of the missing gun.

On the first point, we in the National Aviation Museum have an advantage in commenting on this important matter for we have flown our Nieuport 17 at large numbers of major air shows in Canada over a period of 15 years. The aircraft has an original 110/120 H.P. rotary engine as did Bishop's aircraft and has no braking system as is common with most WWI fighters. To begin with, Bishop or any other competent pilot could land the Nieuport 17 on reasonable ground conditions and very quickly bring it to halt simply by depressing the "blip" switch on the control column (which cuts the electrical circuit to the Spark plugs, thereby reducing engine speed and thrust) while keeping the control column fully back after a full-stall landing which causes the tail skid (designed for stopping) to be held on the ground. He would have no difficulty then holding it there by judicious intermittent use of the "blip" switch (if he held it down continuously, the engine would stop).

Now, let's look at the real problem. The 110/120 horsepower Le Rhone rotary has the characteristics of all early rotary engines, - they have a high idling speed in proportion to the full power r.p.m. They simply do not "tick over" as a radial or in-line engine would do - in fact, with their fixed-pitch wooden propeller, they idle at about 45% full engine speed (500 r.p.m. as against 1150 r.p.m. for take-off at full power, - this compared with the average modern light aircraft with brakes having an idling speed 600-650 r.p.m. against approx. 2700 r.p.m. at full take-off power!). The blip switch of a rotary engined aircraft is the only means of further reducing the engine speed and, subsequently, power and propeller thrust. But, if the pilot of a rotary engined fighter lands and there is no one to assist him while he gets out of the aircraft, what does he do?

- a) does he shut down the engine (by holding the blip switch down until it stops) and hope that he can start it at the last setting? If so, he must bear in mind that if it should start again, there would be a sudden surge of 45% full power while he frantically tries to run around the wing tip and get into the cockpit before the machine jumps makeshift wheel chocks (tree branches, etc.) and gets away or flips over on its nose;
- b) does he leave the engine running and attempt to tie the stick back as far as it will go in the hopes of keeping the tail skid firmly on the ground at 45% power, - get out of the aircraft and hope that, relieved of his weight, the aircraft does not roll ahead and probably stand on its nose breaking the propeller. (Remember, if it starts to move ahead, there is a good chance that the tail will rise and a nose-over or runaway aircraft in rough ground is quite likely.) The whole idea of a pilot attempting to carry out this kind of exercise is, to me, ridiculous.

One final comment on this point is that it was not uncommon for pilots to land an aircraft on suitable ground during WWI, particularly, if they wanted to land near an enemy aircraft they had forced down. However, because the downed aircraft would attract attention of military people on the ground, as is proven by the photographs of the time, then there would be plenty of assistance in restarting the engine and restraining the aircraft until the pilot was ready to take off.

There is no question that Hollywood stunt pilots would find a way to do it alone (taxi the aircraft up an incline), but we are talking about the reality of uncertain terrain in war time conditions.

On the second point, the damage to Billy Bishop's aircraft was, as you may know, revealed in a report dated June 30, 1917 made to the Headquarters of 13th Wing by Captain Grid Caldwell, his Flight Commander which clearly states "damage done: 17 bullet holes, trailing edge of lower plane shot away in two bays". It does not indicate whether it was the port or starboard lower plane. The fabric just ahead of the trailing edge undoubtedly began to shred after a concentrated burst and, subsequently, began to peel back to the trailing edge of the wing.

There have been suggestions by people who lack knowledge about such things that if the aircraft had been shot up to that extent in the morning, then it could not have been flown by Bishop later that day. This is a totally false statement. Had our own Nieuport 17 suffered such damage, we could have it in the air again within a few hours due to the extremely rapid drying "dope" used to attach the fabric patches. The technique we would use would be the same as in WWI. The mechanics of the time were used to this kind of problem, which highlights one of the advantages of a fabric covered aircraft.

On the third point, I am intrigued by the suggestion that any pilot would fire a machine gun into the relatively fragile structure of a WWI aircraft before flying it again. Given that the structure of the Nieuport 17 was basically a fabric-covered, wooden, wire-braced frame (with the tail assembly and ailerons having a light steel tube perimeter), - can you imagine anyone doing that? The chance of severing some vital member is quite real. If he did that, his next take-off would be his last. On the question of the missing Lewis machine gun, there are several possibilities. The Lewis machine gun on the Nieuport 17 can be swung down into a muzzle-high position by the pilot by the simple action of pulling a cable release to the front lock and pulling the butt downward to put it in a position for the removal of the empty cartridge drum and replacing it with a full drum. It is possible that Bishop found that the gun may have jammed in that position interfering with his vision and, at the same time, being in a useless position causing nothing but aerodynamic drag. It would be a simple matter to loosen the thumb screw on the main clamp, unscrew the Bowden cable and throw the gun overboard. One other strong possibility is that the gun became dislodged and twisted off its mount during the gyrations of aerial combat. I understand that this would not have been the first time that this would have occurred.

I do hope the foregoing might be of some interest and value in your deliberations.

Associate Director

APPENDIX "C"

EXCERPT FROM ESSAY/LETTER FROM WALTER "FREDDIE" TO WESLEY ROGERS - APPROXIMATELY 1952

Note: Freddie Bourne is the name of Bishop's Air Mechanic in 60 Squadron, RFC. He is referred to as Walter Bourne in a book by W. Arthur Bishop The Courage of the Early Morning, and also as Walter Bourne in the stage play Billy Bishop Goes to War and in the NFB production The Kid Who Couldn't Miss. Bourne's full name was Frederick William Charles Bourne. He was buried on 9 March 1956 in St. John's Cemetery, Margate, Kent, England. The excerpt that follows, was part of a 20-page essay on Bourne's memories of Bishop, description of England's school system, labour laws, etc. The essay was sent to Wesley Rogers, son of Freddie Bourne's friend, Winnie Rogers, now (1987) 88 years of age and a resident of Thunder Bay, Ontario.

"...In the first World War I was shot down just behind Arras. I was then a machine gunner. I was wounded in my left hand so in the end was grounded as two of my fingers were bent. I became a Mechanic. As your Mum remembers I was apprenticed as a Motor Engineer. I became Mechanic to Air Marshall (sic) William Avery Bishop V.C., D.S.O. & Bar, M.C., D.F.C., Chevalier of Legion of Honour, Croix de Guerre & Palm (Bar and Palm means twice). They called him the Deadliest air Ace and (he) was a Canadian. He got his machines down on my machines or kites as we call them today. 72 kites and 23 (sic) Ballons. He thought the world of me and would never leave for a scrap if I was not there to see him off. I was the only one to service his engine, and no one was allowed to touch his guns only me. I had to be his armourer. His words always to me before he went into the Mess Don't forget Bourne None of that God Damn Bloody!!! Yank Ammo in my drums. (Promise.) I used to fit every round of ammo into the breach (sic) of the Lewis before putting them into the drums. That was to make sure that no cartridge case stuck and caused a jamm (sic). He came over here in the last war and broadcast with Churchill, photo enclosed, (let me have it back). He wrote one or two letters to me whilst here which I have still got. In the last war he was Air Marshall in Charge of Recruiting for the Canadian Air Force. When he first came to me he was a Captain from the Calgary (sic) Cavalry and left me for England as a Colonel. He tried to get me back to England with him but was not lucky. He is the mightiest Pilot living today. There has been no one to touch his score not even in the last war. Believe me he was a game fighter. In 1930 I received a 72 worded telegram from him as he was in England. He wanted me to go and see him. I went up to see him and he introduced me to his wife. He wanted me to go out to Canada with him and service his Moth and then drive his Bently (sic) from one City both in Canada and the U.S.A. to another. He was on a lecture tour. I would not promise until I had seen my wife, but she would not go (& I think your mother will know the reason why). So I had to refuse the job that would have been the making of me, $200 a month and all expenses paid. That was a lot of money in those days. Twelve months afterwards my wife and I were parted for over 20 years. Still that was my luck in life, or as one says the fates against me. Perhaps you could do something for me Wesley. Do you think it would be possible to find out his address. I think it could be found out through the Veterans. He is well known in Canada as Canada's Biggest Air Ace of the First War and was Air Marshall in the RCAF in the last. I would sure love to drop him a line he is only 12 months older than I 58 years. He does not know that I lost my legs. Well Wes enough of this. I will carry on with another subject..."

GUYANA, TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

GOODWILL VISIT BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, July 12, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to a goodwill visit by a Canadian Parliamentary delegation to Guyana, Trinidad and Tobago, which took place from April 24 to 28, 1988.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I first apologize to Senator Turner for not having spoken to him about this, and it may be that it is all right to go ahead, but I was asked to mention to Senator Turner just a few moments ago, although I did not get a chance to do so, that there are three committees meeting when the Senate rises. If I am not mistaken, they are Transport and Communications, Rules, and Banking, Trade and Commerce. The problem is that four members of the reporting staff are away sick, and it may be that we will run a little thin on reporters. I suppose we can let this motion go, knowing that there will be some strain on the reporting staff if, for example, this committee is meeting at the same time as the other two.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With the caveat of Senator Frith, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

ALBERTA—DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAM—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a very simple question of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Can he advise us when he thinks an agreement will be signed between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta respecting the drought relief program that was announced last week? I checked yesterday and my information from the PFRA administration in Regina was that an agreement had been reached between Manitoba and Canada and between Saskatchewan and Canada. While Alberta expected to reach an agreement imminently—yesterday or this morning—he could not confirm that they did.

This matter is urgent, because after an agreement is reached the provincial crop insurance administration will handle the matter. I have not yet been able to find out whether there has been an agreement, and the people in the crop insurance administration who are to handle the applications from producers do not yet know whether they have the go-ahead. They do not know the details of the provisions in the relief program.

Although I suppose we could wait another day or two for that agreement, I am getting inquiries on whether the administration is ready to accept applications for the very welcome relief that will come from the program that was announced last week.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my information is not as current as it should be on the status of discussions between the federal government and the Alberta government. I shall make immediate inquiries and report to the honourable senator tomorrow.

THE SENATE

COST OF PRODUCTION OF APPENDICES IN DEBATES AND MINUTES

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I should like to draw to the attention of senators that there was published in yesterday's Debates of the Senate an appendix which relates to the report of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. I note that in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate the same report is printed verbatim in both French and English. How many times do we have to reprint these things? I thought that this matter was debated some time ago and that we had agreed to do away with these excessive printings of the same report. That has obviously not been done.

I understand that it costs at least $35 a page to print these texts. As senators are aware, we are expected to show some measure of economy in the way we handle our business. I thought it would be useful to draw this matter to the attention of honourable senators. I wonder whether anything is going to be done about it once and for all.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1987

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Michel Cogger moved the third reading of Bill C-131, to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Would the honourable senator accept a question? Could he tell us what this bill is all about?

Senator Cogger: Yes. It is unfortunate that Senator Sinclair was not here for my brilliant, I thought, exposé last week—

Senator Frith: And an even more brilliant interjection by Senator Marsden!

Senator Cogger: —which was seconded and endorsed enthusiastically by Senator Marsden. Honourable senators, this is a bill amending the National Transportation Act, 1987 to extend to handicapped persons easier access to aircraft, airports and related facilities.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, for the second reading of the Bill C-137, An Act to provide for incentives to assist in financing exploration for mineral resources and hydrocarbons in Canada and to amend the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program Act.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Balfour discussed this piece of legislation. As I am sure honourable senators know, he indicated that the bill is a complicated measure. In principle, it is not that complicated, but flow-through shares, of their very nature, are complicated.

While there is a transition period both in regard to hydrocarbons and mining, the allowances made under existing legislation expire at various dates during the balance of this year. People who will invest and set up flow-through share portfolios will take some time to develop the programs. While it might be looked at, there is no urgency for this legislation in view of the transition periods, which are October with respect to one part of it and the end of the year with respect to the other part of it.

Nevertheless, to enable people to proceed with these matters in an orderly way and not be left to the last minute to know what they will do, this bill should receive our attention soon.

There are some complications with regard to the impact of it in relation to the size of the firms to which it will apply. It may be that officials and the minister will be able to tell us, from the consultations that they have had with the mining industry and the hydrocarbon industry, how these consultations have gone and what issues are outstanding. If this bill were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and we were able to have the minister and officials appear before us, then the decision could be made by that committee as to whether other witnesses would be necessary.

I take it from what Senator Balfour said that it was in his mind that the matter would be referred to the committee. I see that he is here now.

I am not disagreeing with anything that you said, Senator Balfour, I am merely suggesting that, if it could go to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and we could hear both the minister and his officials, a decision could then be made as to whether we would need to have other witnesses to take us through some of the difficulties of flow-through shares and the various provisions of the act. Therefore, I hope the matter can be referred to the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN)—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill S-16, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn).—(Honourable Senator Guay, P.C.).

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I am now ready to take part in this particular debate in support of Senator Haidasz on Bill S-16.

The intent of Bill S-16 is to amend the Criminal Code in order to protect the unborn. The need for such a bill has come about because of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case on January 28 of this year, which declared Canada's abortion law to be unconstitutional. This decision of the Supreme Court of Canada has left the unborn with no legal protection whatsoever.

The purpose of Bill S-16, which was introduced by Senator Haidasz, is to reassert society's vital interest in its unborn children. It is the intention of this bill to give full legal protection to children from the moment of conception.

[Translation]

In the case of abortion, Bill S-16 provides for the same penalties as had been imposed by Parliament in 1969. They range from life imprisonment for anyone who procures an abortion to a two-year prison term for women who get aborted.

However, it provides an exception in cases where the life of the unborn human being was ended as a result of medical-treatment necessary to prevent the death of the mother or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would cause the death of that mother. I feel the penalties provided for in Bill S-16 are needed to extend legal protection to the unborn human being. I am convinced that such legislation will have a deterrent effect that will influence behaviour and lead to greater respect for the life of the unborn human being.

[English]

To those who are not convinced of the necessity of adopting Bill S-16, I should like to submit evidence presented in the case involving Joseph Borowski. Probably many of you will remember that Mr. Borowski was a minister in the NDP government of the Honourable Ed Schreyer in Manitoba.

The evidence I am about to relate was presented in this case before the Court of Queen's Bench in Regina, Saskatchewan, in May 1983 by Sir William Lily of New Zealand. Sir William is a professor of perinatal medicine and a consultant to the World Health Organization in maternal and child health, who was knighted because of his pioneer work in the field of amniocentesis.

In his testimony Sir William stated that the unborn is not part of the mother's body but a separate person, who dictates his own growth and when he is to be born. He also indicated that a fetus produces his own blood 17 to 20 days after conception, that his heart begins beating 24 to 25 days afterward and that by 35 days his brainwave activity can be recorded. With that kind of scientific evidence confirming that life begins at conception, is it still possible to deny the need to give full legal protection to the unborn? Parliament has a duty to protect all human beings, especially the mentally handicapped, the physically disabled and senior citizens. After all, we all become seniors eventually. I believe this protection should be extended to the unborn human being from the moment of conception.

I should like to turn to the argument often used by pro-choice groups who state that anti-abortionists are seeking to impose their own religious views on society. I submit that the anti-abortion stance does not rest on any particular religious faith. It is rooted in the concept of natural law that was first developed by Greek, not Christian, philosophers. This means that it is unnecessary to call on any particular religious belief to justify opposition to abortion. Indeed, opposition to abortion has existed in many societies devoid of Christian influence. The Sumerians condemned abortion about 2000 years before Christ. The Greek philosopher Hippocrates in 500 B.C. incorporated condemnation of abortion into the Hippocratic oath, which, until a couple of decades ago, was sworn by graduates of all medical schools, binding them to take every means at their disposal to protect the life of the unborn human being.

The Declaration of Geneva is a modernized version of the Hippocratic oath adopted by the World Medical Association in 1948. It states specifically, "I will maintain the utmost respect for human life from the time of conception." The preamble of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of the Child contains these words:

Whereas the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth...

This declaration, proclaimed in 1959 by the General Assembly, received the endorsement of countries with no Christian tradition whatsoever.

[Translation]

So we see that the anti-abortion stance is rooted in the natural law. Also, I feel it is impossible to combine the opinion of the pro-choice groups with the well-known notion that all human life has an intrinsic value. Yet, this notion is crucial since it is the basis of our individual rights. In fact, it is at the very heart of our political traditions. Have you ever noticed that many of those against capital punishment refer to the intrinsic value of all human life? Don't you see a paradox in the fact that we often use that argument to save the lives of criminals who have killed other human beings while we refuse to show the same compassion for the most defenceless being in the world, the unborn human being.

[English]

Many Canadians feel that their basic sense of decency has been deeply offended when they learn that, according to Statistics Canada, 60,956 women had abortions in this country in 1985. I would point out that Statistics Canada reports only those abortions that are recorded; in fact, there were probably many more. Remember that these abortions took place under section 251 of the Criminal Code, passed in 1969, which restricts abortions to accredited hospitals, and even then only to cases where the majority of the members of the hospital's therapeutic abortion committee have certified that the pregnancy is a danger to the life or health of the woman.

Even with such restrictions there were more than 60,000 in the one year, and now, since the Supreme Court judgment of last January, any woman in Canada can have an abortion if she can find a doctor who will perform it.

If one examines the statistics, one can see that in 1985 there were, as I said, 60,956 abortions. The statistics from 1970 to 1985 indicate that abortions are on the rise. But most disturbing are the statistics showing repeat abortions from 1974 to 1982. In 1982, 400 women in Canada had their fourth abortion or more; 1,600 women in Canada had their third abortion in 1982; and 9,544 women had their second abortion in 1982. If one examines the statistics from 1974 to 1982, one will find that the situation has not changed dramatically.

We have a situation in Canada today in which all these human lives are taken on an annual basis. It is incumbent upon Parliament to deal with this issue in an expeditious way at the earliest opportunity.

Honourable senators, like so many of my fellow Canadians, I feel that the realities of abortion must be honestly assessed, taking into account a special awareness of the individual and the social consequences of this practice. To that end, I wish to draw your attention to the conclusions of an article by Raymond Michael, a psychiatric resident, and Terese Ferri, a lawyer, published in The Catholic Lawyer. If you want to make reference to it, it is in volume 30, number 4, page 363. I quote:

The significance of the abortion issue in modern society cannot be underestimated. It has become the point around which two fundamentally irreconcilable sets of values have begun to crystallize. The division it represents is perhaps more profound than any other. It implies opposing views about such fundamental issues as the function of law, the purpose of medicine and the very nature and value of human life.

The quotation continues:

One view offers a society caught in the web of its own narcissistic tyranny, which frantically seeks immediate gratification in a futile attempt to sustain its fantasies of omnipotence and invulnerability; fantasies which will ultimately crumble under the weight of a reality it refuses to face. The other holds hope for a future society which is compassionate and rational, which protects its most vulnerable and has the fortitude to sacrifice immediate gratification for the sake of the values and principles that will insure its long-term survival and betterment. The choice is ours.

[Translation]

Personally, I have made up my mind. I support Bill S-16 because I firmly believe that unborn human beings must be protected. However, I also believe that various levels of government must work together to develop measures which will adequately meet the needs of children and their parents. In the field of child care and low rental housing, for example, the needs are tremendous and the costs enormous. And yet, like my colleague Senator Haidasz, I am convinced that that is the price we must pay to ensure a place for children in our society.

I would like to congratulate Senator Haidasz for his courage and for having taken the time to introduce Bill S-16.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Would the honourable senator take a question?

Senator Guay: Oh, yes. Go ahead.

Senator Buckwold: I do not like to delay the proceedings, but there are some things that provoke a question. Senator Guay based his entire case on the fact that life begins at conception, and he started his presentation today by quoting a very learned and respected doctor who was brought over from New Zealand to testify in the case involving Joe Borowski. It was on that presentation that I believe Senator Guay based most of his facts and conclusions, but, as I recall, the court did not see it that way.

My question to Senator Guay is: What was the result of that particular court case and the decision that was rendered? Did it support the evidence given by the esteemed doctor or otherwise?

Senator Guay: That is an easy question to answer, honourable senators, because that particular case was never finalized, in view of the judgment of the Supreme Court taken in January 1988. It was never finished.

Senator Buckwold: From what I gather, and I may be wrong, it has never been finished because it is under appeal.

Senator Guay: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Could you tell me the result of the first court case, the one to which you were referring?

Senator Guay: No. I do not have any particular reason to give you the results. You can read them as well as I can. I am one of those who support Joe Borowski. The results are plain for anyone to see. I am sure that the honourable senator from Saskatoon knows the results as well as I do.

Senator Buckwold: I have already given my indication of the results, namely, that the case was lost and that the evidence did not particularly impress the court. All I wanted you to express was the fact that that was the way the case went. I just wanted to make sure that, for the record, we did not leave untouched the argument that you have presented—in other words, the evidence of this particular doctor.

● (1430)

Senator Guay: I am not a lawyer; however, I will say that I think Joe Borowski did a good job. Senator Buckwold is familiar with the details of the case; although Senator Buckwold thinks Joe Borowski is finished, I do not think so.

As I said, the case was never finalized. Even though Senator Buckwold is drawing the conclusion that Joe Borowski lost the case, I say that he did not, that he did a good job and that he ought to be complimented for bringing the matter as far as he did.

I am sure that, if the appeal is brought forward, he will be given more consideration than he received in the past. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms makes a big difference. I wish someone would look at the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this regard. I think that the unborn should be considered human beings, just as the rest of us are.

On motion of Senator Kelly, debate adjourned.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-141, to regulate the marketing of agricultural products in import, export and interprovincial trade and to provide for national standards and grades of agricultural products, for their inspection and grading, for the registration of establishments and for standards governing establishments.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak today in support of Bill C-141, the Canada Agricultural Products Bill. With this legislation, this government is acting on another promise to Canada's farmers and the agri-food industry.

This legislation will enhance our ability to market our agricultural products at home and abroad and it will offer increased protection for consumers.

I can assure the members of this chamber that there is broad support for this legislation within the agri-food industry. In fact, 26 national organizations support this legislation. These include the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Retail Council of Canada and the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Support for the bill is especially strong in the horticultural sector. This sector is comprised of more than 27,000 fresh fruit and vegetable producers. Horticulture makes a significant economic contribution to every Canadian province.

The Atlantic region produces about 14 per cent of the farmgate value of all Canadian fruits and vegetables. It leads in the production of all types of potatoes. Quebec accounts for 15 per cent of Canada's horticultural crops. It ranks first in the production of carrots, lettuce and celery. Ontario's horticultural sector is highly diversified. It represents almost 44 per cent of total Canadian production. The prairie provinces have recently developed a horticultural sector of their own. About 8 per cent of Canada's horticultural products is now produced on the prairies. British Columbia, with its Okanagan Valley and fertile lower mainland, produces about 16 per cent of Canada's horticultural crops. Honourable senators can see that Bill C-141 is truly in the national interest.

Canada's fruit and vegetable growers and handlers are counting on members of this chamber to give swift passage to this legislation. With the approach of the new crop season, the Canadian Horticultural Council and the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers' Association consider Bill C-141 essential to continued orderly marketing and stability.

Times change, but the legislation governing our agriculture standards has not. The Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act exists almost in its original form.

The CAPS Act was passed in 1955. It consolidated previous legislation to set national standards and regulations for international and interprovincial trade in agricultural products.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, there are long-standing deficiencies and ambiguities in this law. It is impractical—in some cases impossible—to enforce.

Canada must bring regulations governing agricultural products up to date. This new legislation—the Canada Agricultural Products Act—will help the entire agriculture industry, and especially the horticulture sector, move boldly into the future.

Since 1955 domestic production of fruits and vegetables has increased tenfold. Fruit and vegetable production has an annual farmgate value of almost $1.7 billion. In 1955 imports of fresh fruits and vegetables were valued at $88 million. These imports are now worth more than $1.1 billion.

Fresh fruits and vegetables must be marketed very shortly after harvest because of their perishable nature. When product is ready, it must be shipped without delay. The sooner it is sold, the higher the quality.

Canada's fresh fruit and vegetable producers are vulnerable to surplus products dumped on our domestic markets. These surplus products are shipped to Canada prior to being sold. In the trade, these loads are called "rollers". They are often sold at depressed prices, in direct competition with Canadian production and pre-purchased imports.

Rollers must meet minimum import quality standards when they enter Canada, but they often arrive in less than top condition. This means shelf life is reduced, and consumers are often disappointed in the quality of the produce. This suspect freshness and quality of rollers often leads to disputes between shippers and receivers. The two parties can be at odds over prices for deteriorating produce. The Canadian Board of Arbitration, with authority under the CAPS Act, is one means by which these types of disputes may be resolved. The board reports a greater incidence of consignment sales of imported produce, and it is increasingly being called upon to resolve disputes about prices for produce that is well beyond its peak of freshness.

If we were not to take steps to ensure proper marketing procedures, there could be a major impact on Canadian fruit and vegetable growers. They could suffer a measurable loss of market share and no doubt some would be forced out of business.

When the CAPS Act was introduced in 1955, it consolidated a number of existing acts, including the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act. However, the import provisions regarding consignment selling—sections 56 and 57—were not consolidated but remained under the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act. These sections required importers or their brokers to provide evidence that shipments of produce were purchased within 24 hours of the time of shipment from the point of production. If no such evidence was provided, shipments were turned back at the border by Canada Customs.

For over 40 years these regulations controlled imports on a consignment basis. In other words, imports could only enter Canada under a prior-purchase agreement. However, in January of 1983 we hit a bump in the road and the wheels fell off our regulations. As part of its overall review, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments examined the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act and ruled that the act lacked the enabling authority to regulate consignment selling. For more than five years these regulations have not been actively enforced.

Bill C-141 would reintroduce the authority to regulate consignment selling of fresh fruits and vegetables. These regulations would apply to both imported produce and produce grown here in Canada.

Consignment sales are especially worrisome to Canada's tender fruit producers. Fresh fruit such as cherries and peaches must go to market right after harvest, and in Canada there is a relatively short season for these fruits. It would be a severe blow to these producers if large consignments of tender fruits were allowed to enter their traditional markets during this time.

I assure the members of this chamber that Canada can reintroduce regulations to control consignment selling without in any way undermining our trade agreement with the United States. Canadian negotiators made our position on this matter very clear to the American side when we worked on this agreement. The Americans fully understand that we will proceed with this action. Since the agreement was announced this government has openly and consistently stated its intention to proceed with this legislation. It is no surprise. It is not a threat to the bilateral agreement, and it conforms with Canada's international rights and obligations under GATT.

Under Bill C-141, the Canadian Board of Arbitration and Review Tribunal would be maintained. This will ensure that the system continues to work fairly for dealers and buyers of fresh fruits and vegetables. The board will consider complaints against dealers and provide rulings in accordance with the act. The tribunal will hear any appeals against the board's rulings.

There is also a need to provide flexibility in the act to permit exemptions where enforcement of the legislation is undesirable or impractical. For example, trial marketing of new products or packaging could be hindered without controlled exemptions from the requirements of the act and its regulations. In addition, fresh fruit and vegetable packers and processors sometimes require temporary exemptions from packaging and grade requirements when Canadian produce is not available. These exemptions permit the movement of bulk produce which is otherwise controlled by regulations, allowing orderly and efficient marketing between provinces and between Canada and other countries.

The new legislation will also provide the authority to establish grades and grade names, packaging and labelling requirements and fees. The trademarking of federal grade names will make Canada's inspection system more effective and credible. It will also benefit the consumer by ensuring consistent quality of safe agricultural products.

Improved control of products imported or traded interprovincially will protect consumers from products that do not meet our health and wholesomeness standards. Additional provisions will allow Agriculture Canada to respond to developments in the agriculture sector and provide authority for cost recovery and privatization.

Proposed revisions will increase penalties established in 1955 and provide a general updating of the act similar to revisions made to the Meat Inspection Act in May of 1985.

To ensure the use of fair and ethical trading practices and the orderly marketing of safe, wholesome agricultural products, it is necessary to improve the licensing of dealers of agricultural products. We must clearly identify the terms and conditions under which they operate. There must be no ambiguity about the registration, maintenance and operation of dealerships.

Honourable senators, the Canada Agricultural Products Act will update the current provisions governing trade and product standards. Outdated legislation will be replaced by a law that can help guide the agri-food industry into the 21st century. Bill C-141 will help to maintain order and stability in the marketplace. In addition, improved regulation of agriculture exports will enhance Canada's reputation as a supplier of safe, wholesome, high-quality food and will help to maintain and expand export markets.

This is much-needed legislation, honourable senators, and it deserves the support of this chamber.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I apologize to Senator Olson, who wishes to speak, but I shall be brief. I understand that we are going into Committee of the Whole on this bill this afternoon. Would it be asking too much of Senator Robertson to request that she have her speech photocopied and distributed? Much as I wanted to follow her, she spoke rather quickly and there are some points I wish to raise with the minister. It would be helpful if we had the text of her speech before us as we go into Committee of the Whole.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I will see that that is done immediately.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about Bill C-141 at second reading. Senator Robertson has done an excellent job in providing an overview of the effect of this new legislation. It is not entirely new in that it replaces an existing act, but it is new in many respects. Senator Robertson also outlined that this is an extraordinary piece of legislation in that it must be dealt with very quickly. The fact is, however, that a number of aspects of this bill really ought to be studied in some detail. I appreciate that this cannot be done because of the extraordinary circumstances, but perhaps I could highlight some of my concerns about this process.

Honourable senators, I have no objection to our proceeding with this legislation in a timely manner. I understand that we are to go into Committee of the Whole this afternoon and I have a few questions for the minister and his officials. I do not intend to duplicate what Senator Robertson has already covered, but, as I said, I would like to highlight a few of my concerns.

This bill amends one of seven acts in the agricultural sector—the one dealing with standards and standardization—that must be amended under the terms and conditions of the Free Trade Agreement. In the House of Commons much was made of the fact that this legislation was brought forward on June 30 and given first, second and third reading, as well as committee treatment, in one day. That was done for the very reasons we are being asked to do the same here.

Under the circumstances, it occurs to me that it would be well if the government tried to assist those of us in opposition by including us in any briefings that might be held. I am not sure whether such briefings were held—perhaps Senator Robertson found herself at the same disadvantage as I, in having simply to rely on the House of Commons Debates, on the bill and on whatever other material she could gather to inform herself.

In the normal course, first, second and third readings would take sufficient time to give us ample opportunity to look into the legislation. But I did want to put on the record a request—which is directed to the leadership on both sides, I suppose—that in future, under such circumstances, it would be a good idea to hold a joint briefing, as was done in the opposition lobby of the House of Commons at 11 o'clock a.m., June 30. That briefing was mentioned in the House of Commons Debates at page 16978.

Let me say, in support of what Senator Robertson has put before us, that, in the horticultural area—particularly in the tender fruit area and specifically referring to cherries—there is good reason to pass this bill on an urgent basis so that the act can be proclaimed and regulations promulgated as quickly as possible. This will deal with an unfair competitive situation that caused great harm to some horticultural producers last year, particularly those in the cherry sector.

A year or so ago we dealt with an amendment to the Farm Improvement Loans Act in a similar way. If I may, I will pass on to senators observations made in the house at that time. That act was passed on an urgent basis, but it was not proclaimed for eight months. With the benefit of hindsight, it is obvious that the reasons given for dealing urgently with that legislation were wrong. I am not saying that anyone was misled, but it is my hope that that will not be the case with this bill. One of the things I am anxious to have put on the record here in Committee of the Whole is the minister's intent to proclaim this legislation quickly and pass the necessary regulations to deal with the problems that are the reason for this extraordinary treatment.

With those few comments, honourable senators, I shall conclude, except to say that I look forward to asking a few questions of the minister and his officials in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I merely want to intervene briefly in the debate at second reading. I know that we will have an opportunity to ask the Minister of State for Agriculture some questions.

I want to say at second reading that, since the act allowing the administration to draw up certain regulations was struck down by the committee, I fully support the notion that we must have in place a statute under which regulations can be drawn to deal with a number of matters. One such matter is sometimes referred to as “consignment selling”. That is probably just a fancy term for the practice of dumping surplus—and it is not always even surplus—American products onto the Canadian market simply because we are farther north and our crops are harvested later. There have been many occasions on which the tail end of their production, which they are anxious to get rid of, has been dumped, although the practice does not quite fit the technical interpretation of that word, because the products are probably not sold in Canada at a price lower than that at which they are sold in the United States. What happens is this: When the U.S. producers have passed their peak in terms of marketing—and this is in relation to potatoes, lettuce and many other crops—those products hit the Canadian market at the peak of our season. Consequently, the entire market in Canada is depressed. I am certainly in favour of putting in place some new statutory authority so that the government can make and enforce regulations to deal with that situation. It would only need to be for a certain number of weeks in any year, because during the rest of the year, obviously, the Canadian consumer should have a right to buy these things as cheaply as possible. But, in fairness, if we do not have regulations to deal with this situation, we will put our whole industry out of business. That can happen in places like southern Alberta, for example, or British Columbia, unless there are some rules.

● (1500)

While we want to endorse that aspect of this legislation, we realize that, when we are asked by Senator Robertson to give swift passage to this bill, what she is really asking—and I will not resist it today—is that we do not ask the industry what they think of the way Bill C-141 is written. We are probably willing to do that, but in passing good legislation we should have had a few committee hearings and called in some people from the industry—the growers, the processors, the brokers and the rest of the marketers—to find out whether their experience indicates that the provisions in Bill C-141 are adequate to do the job that needs to be done, in fairness to both our consumers and our growers. However, we do not know that, so we will forgo that.

I should like to ask the minister some questions about how he intends to handle the making of the regulations, because he said in the other place that he would have all the regulations ready for proclamation within two weeks. That may be enough time so that the problem that the cherry producers had last year can be avoided, but there are a whole lot of other products coming on the market at various times in the year where these kinds of regulations are also needed.

I want to conclude by saying that, while we support the kind of authority asked for in Bill C-141, there are some problems in passing it all in one day. I hope the minister will give us satisfactory answers to show that the consultation with the industry has been extensive enough to ensure that what is in Bill C-141 is the correct thing. Some of us may have some ideas on what should be there, but we have not gone through the detailed analysis of it—at least I have not done so recently to satisfy myself that it is appropriate to meet all the conditions that need to be met.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words about Bill C-141—especially since the promoter of this bill is from that great province of New Brunswick. The province of Prince Edward Island is also badly affected by this bill in relation to potato inspection.

Prince Edward Island exports approximately 95 per cent of its potatoes. Because of that, it has to have them inspected. New Brunswick exports a good percentage of its potatoes, and those potatoes must, as well, be inspected for export. Until September 1984 the federal government paid the inspection fees for inspectors and that was done free of cost to the producers. In the fall of 1984 the federal government changed the policy and charged the farmers and producers for inspecting their potatoes for export.

When it came to provinces like Ontario, they could not grow enough potatoes for themselves. Therefore, they imported potatoes. Quebec and the western provinces did the same, so they were not affected by that change in policy. The only provinces in Canada that were affected by it, by this extra charge, were New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Can the promoter of this bill tell me if the inspectors appointed under this legislation will be paid by the federal government and not by the producers, especially concerning potato inspectors in Prince Edward Island, where it is expensive for potato farmers who are having a hard year because of the drought? The Minister of Agriculture refused to assist the farmers of Prince Edward Island with their drought problem, although help was available to western farmers.

Again, in Prince Edward Island, we have been jeopardized by paying special fees, because potatoes have to be exported outside our province. Because the potatoes go from one province to another, they are considered to be an export and we must pay special fees. Could the promoter of the bill tell me if, under this bill, that will be done away with and the federal government will now pay the full fee for the inspection of these potatoes?

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I want to advise the Senate that if Senator Robertson speaks now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the second reading of this bill.

Senator Robertson:—I appreciate your remarks and general support for this legislation. I also appreciate the difficulties that we have. When we do not have the opportunity to make a proper assessment of legislation, it can be difficult, and I understand your concern.

In response to Senator Hays' suggestion of briefings, I am sure it would be well received by the department. I have been advised that we do not have to worry about the proclamation of this piece of legislation, Senator Hays, because the proclamation will coincide with Royal Assent. The Deputy Leader of the Government suggested this morning that we will probably have Royal Assent on this bill—if it gets through today and tomorrow—tomorrow evening if we receive that kind of support. So it would be proclaimed at the time of Royal Assent.

Senator Olson, there is a wealth of support for the bill, as I have mentioned. There have been many consultations with various organizations in Canada. The minister can give you better details on that than I can. I have been advised that there are 26 national organizations that actively support the bill. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, for instance, and the various producing organizations have been supportive of this bill. So it seems to have been drafted in a manner that meets their concerns and expectations.

I am also advised that the regulations have been drafted as far as they can be until the bill has Royal Assent. It would be a matter of a few days for the rest of the regulations to fall in place. I understand that the staff have been working hard at drafting as many regulations as possible, using the consultative process as well; so that that should not take long. Again, you may wish to ask the minister about that; he will be here at your pleasure.

Senator Bonnell, concerning potato inspectors, I believe your problem has been resolved. I asked about the inspection and whether it would generally be looked after by the federal government. I was advised that, yes, that quirk in the delivery of inspection services that we have down home will be accommodated, but we should ask the minister again when he comes. I would side with you; I hope it has been accommodated. But, generally speaking, inspection services are being provided by the federal government.

Honourable senators, that is all I wish to say at this particular point. Since we will hear from the Minister of State for Agriculture shortly this afternoon, you can put more direct questions to him then and you will have your answers given more explicitly by the minister.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (1510)

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bazin, that this bill be now referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Bélisle in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Pierre Blais, Minister of State for Agriculture, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to take into consideration Bill C-141. Senator Doody, will you introduce the minister?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to welcome to this committee today the Honourable Pierre Blais, the Minister of State for Agriculture, and his officials. I am sure that the minister will be delighted to answer any questions that you may have, and I am sure he will introduce his officials to you.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before asking the minister, the Honourable Pierre Blais, to make a statement, if he has one to make, I have on my list Senator Olson, Senator Bonnell, Senator Hays and Senator Corbin.

Mr. Blais, do you have an opening statement? If you have, you may remain seated while you make it.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State for Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, this is a straightforward bill and you already have in your hands all of the details. Therefore, I really do not need to make a statement, but if you want to ask any questions on the bill I will be available to answer them. However, the bill is a fairly technical one and I want honourable senators to be aware of the consequences of asking technical questions.

The point of this bill is to formalize a situation that, in fact, is in existence right at the moment.

[Translation]

We now find in the legislation provisions that have already been declared ultra vires. We must make the law and especially the management of this sector comply with this bill. That is what makes this bill more technical. To a certain extent, we have to do some things and assume some responsibility for Canadian fruit and vegetable producers. That is the main purpose of this bill.

[English]

Now, honourable senators, I am here to answer any questions you may have and my officials are also here to assist me in answering.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. Feel free to answer in the language that is easier for you.

[English]

Honourable senators, I should now like to call upon Senator Olson to begin the questioning.

Senator Olson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I also want to welcome the minister to this chamber. I am sure that he is now prepared to give us some explanations on Bill C-141, which he has just described as a very technical bill. However, this bill will be the basis, I hope, on which he will make some regulations that will have a very practical effect upon a number of producers in Canada. The bill will deal with consignment selling and various other matters. There are a great many questions I could go into, but on the first round I want to deal only with that point.

First of all, I would ask the minister whether his department has prepared a set of regulations to deal with those crops that are coming into season fairly soon. If so, will those regulations be ready in time? However, my question goes rather further than that. For example, there are greenhouse operators who produce certain horticultural crops, such as tomatoes and cucumbers. Prior to the forerunner to Bill C-141 being struck down or declared ultra vires there existed what were called seasonal tariffs. That meant that the greenhouse operators of the crops to which I referred earlier knew in advance when there would be some protection against crops of like produce being dumped, or large quantities being shipped into Canada, and they would have a certain number of weeks at the peak season in which to sell their ripened crops out of their greenhouses.

In view of the fact that some of the seasonal tariffs and the authority for making those kinds of rules were struck down when the forerunner to Bill C-141 was declared ultra vires, will this seasonal window for the greenhouse operators continue?

● (1520)

Mr. Blais: Senator, we are already in the process of having full discussions with the processors and with the industry regarding the regulations. I think the regulations will be ready within the next ten to fourteen days. Therefore, they will be in place immediately after the bill is passed, if it should pass. We have tried to work very hard and very quickly on this matter because we know how important it is to the growers during their season.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister and his officials could explain to us just how this bill will work.

For example, Mr. Minister, what kind of regulations do you intend to make and how enforceable will those regulations be in a practical sense? Let us say, for example, that some producers in California or Arizona are shipping the last of their new potatoes and those potatoes arrive in Canada right when our potato harvest is in full swing and our own produce is coming to the market. According to this bill, there is a 24-hour period during which anything shipped in must be sold to someone, otherwise, under clause 17 or 18 of the bill, that shipment can be seized or required to be shipped back out of the country. I think that is what those clauses mean.

However, perhaps I should not guess at what this bill is intended to do. It would probably be better if you just explained to me what it is your intention to do under the regulations, because I have some knowledge of what has happened in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Your question gives me a chance to clarify and perhaps elaborate on the specific purpose of these regulations. We want to prevent massive imports, whatever the season, of products such as potatoes, tomatoes or other vegetables—in some cases of inferior quality—from depressing prices in Canada. The risk is always there. These regulations will enable us to control access, marketing and retail sales of products so that we can compete with our own Canadian products and keep prices at a level consistent with the expectations of Canadians. I think that is perhaps the most important aspect of this bill.

[English]

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I will be a little more specific. The practice in, let us say, Arizona or California is that when they harvest the field they unload it immediately into warehouses, or into refrigerator cars and trucks if they are shipping it. If the crop is shipped, some of it may be sold in Omaha, some in Chicago, some in Buffalo or wherever. If it is not sold off by the time it gets near the Canadian border, then in some cases they continue on across the border without an invoice attached to the shipment. Obviously, if it is a perishable product, such as tomatoes or lettuce, there are only a few days left in which it is marketable. The price keeps going down as the shipment moves north. By the time that product crosses the Canadian border, although it may not fit the technical interpretation of dumping, the price is much lower than it was farther south. One solution in the past was that such a shipment had to have an invoice containing a date and price in order to enter Canada. Do you hope to reinstate that practice as a result of the authority flowing from Bill C-141?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Honourable senators, I can inform you we intend to maintain the same formula that has enabled us to protect Canadian producers in the past. We are discussing this at the present time with the industry. The regulations will be in line with the existing ones. Protection will be provided, and the procedure will be about the same as it was before. Technically speaking, there will be no changes.

[English]

Senator Olson: In your discussions with the horticultural industry, have they indicated that they believe that this kind of regulation will satisfactorily solve some of the unfair marketing practices they were subjected to in the past?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: This legislation is receiving massive support from all parties. They all agree with our proposals.

You know as well as I do we cannot always deal with problems as they arise, but we will at least have the legal tools to act quickly. This bill is the result of requests made by the Canadian horticultural industry. I think we will have an instrument that will be very practical for our purposes.

The industry agrees. Since we consulted with the provinces and with all other parties concerned, I think that technically we are meeting the needs of all concerned.

[English]

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have one final question for now. Inasmuch as both the other place and this place are dealing with all three stages of this bill, including the committee stage, in one day and are passing it because of the urgency that has been expressed to have the regulations in place and in effect in time, when you have completed those regulations and have had an opportunity to see whether or not they are working well, would you be prepared to find some way of appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with regard to those regulations? Perhaps we could call in some people from the industry to find out whether they are working satisfactorily. Will you give the undertaking that you will come back sometime, if we give the bill speedy passage now?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Honourable senators, I am not very familiar with the Senate. This is my first, and maybe my last visit to this august assembly. Technically, if there is no problem, I am quite willing to come and explain these regulations to anyone who wants to know more about them. We can certainly discuss the matter.

This is the kind of technical question I am not used to answering, but I imagine it could be done.

I will discuss it with Mr. Wise, because he is actually responsible for this area. I will be discussing the matter with him anyway because we are going to work together on the implementation of these regulations. And we must act quickly.

On the face of it, I have no objection. Perhaps Mr. Wise will come if he is available.

[English]

Senator Olson: I can understand your point, and I appreciate your saying that you would like to come back to the Senate sometime in the future. You may take what I said as an invitation to come back to find out how the rules of this place work.

Mr. Blais: I would be interested in learning more about how the Senate works. I can assure you of that.

Senator Bonnell: Mr. Chairman, my question has to do with potatoes, because I come from Prince Edward Island. Since 1984 the farmers in the province of Prince Edward Island have had to pay for the inspection of their potatoes. Since about 95 per cent of the potatoes grown on Prince Edward Island are exported to other provinces or other countries, these inspections are a large expense to the farmers. Will the Government of Canada, under this legislation, pay for the inspections of horticultural products, and specifically for the inspection of potatoes in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, two provinces that export a great percentage of their crops to other provinces and other countries?

● (1530)

Mr. Blais: I can understand that inspection costs can be high from time to time, although I do not know the specific details. We are very proud of the system of inspection in Canada. It is the best system in the world. I can say that the system for the inspection of potatoes from Prince Edward Island will remain exactly the same.

[Translation]

I might mention that there are sometimes costs associated with the inspection sector as a whole. You are probably aware that we have from time to time encountered problems in the past few years with some of the products we have exported. You can easily appreciate the potential damage to our agricultural sector when exported products are found to fall short of the required standards of quality.

We have, in fact, in some cases, suffered setbacks in international export markets because some products did not measure up to those quality standards. That is why we have maintained and will continue to maintain inspection standards at a very high level.

As far as costs are concerned, will producers have to continue to foot the bill? Nothing has been changed in the present structure. They must absorb a part of those costs. No change has been proposed.

I have no specific information on new reactions on the part of producers' associations. To my knowledge, the groups that were consulted, including producers, were favourable to the changes proposed. Concerning this specific point, I have not really heard of any negative reaction on the part of producers.

I can assure you that there is no change and that we are going to maintain the high quality of our inspections.

[English]

Senator Bonnell: I want to congratulate the department for its high level of respect for standards. I think that is good for the industry, for agriculture and for Canada. I believe that must be maintained. However, up until 1984 the government paid the wages and expenses of those inspectors. In September of 1984 the Government of Canada changed the policy so that those expenses are now charges to the producers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Those two provinces export most of their products, their potatoes, because the other provinces do not grow enough potatoes to feed their own people. Consequently, the poorest provinces in Canada are paying these high costs for the inspection of their farm products.

Under this bill, is the government giving consideration to paying the expenses of the inspectors? Those inspectors are appointed by the federal government and they are governed by federal rules and regulations, so why should the federal government not pay their salaries? Regardless of that, the poor producers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have to pay the piper.

[Senator Bonnell.]

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: To reply to that question, I must remind you that what has been put in place since 1984 is a general cost recovery policy. It was discussed, it was analysed, and it is not the purpose of this bill as such.

I agree with you that there have been certain negative reactions from time to time on the part of producers throughout Canada. As a Government, we concluded that this was a good policy.

I must also remind you that it does not apply specifically to Prince Edward Island potato producers, but that it applies everywhere in Canada, to all sectors. This cost recovery policy also applies to meat grading, to fruit and vegetables, in Southern Ontario and in the Montreal region. It also applies to the Atlantic provinces and to the Pacific region, to British Columbia.

Although I am aware of the factor you mentioned, Senator, the fact remains that it is part of a general policy that has been adopted for Canada as a whole. I recognize that it is not a part of this bill as such or of the purposes it seeks to achieve.

[English]

Senator Bonnell: Do you think that the government would accept an amendment to this bill to include a clause to provide for payment to the inspectors to be made by the Government of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: I would add to what I have said previously that even though the cost recovery policy has from time to time provoked some reactions, it was still accepted by the vast majority of the sector.

I must point out that the change you are talking about would indirectly modify a policy implemented by the government only two or three years ago. To some extent, I think that we would be taking some unexpected steps. In a roundabout way, we would be—I wouldn't say creating an unfair situation, but dealing with this problem in a fashion somewhat different from what appears in some other legislation.

It is not easy to answer that question in only two or three minutes, since we are not discussing the main object of the bill. We would nevertheless have to study all the cost recovery legislation currently applicable to the agricultural sector.

You are aware, maybe even better than I am, of all the legislation applying in this case. The object of this bill is to be in harmony with all the other statutes governing the meat inspection sector, and also with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We haven't even touched that issue.

Such an amendment would change the whole object of the bill. We surely have not discussed that seriously. It would go against the guidelines we try to follow, here as well as in the other chamber I suppose, in terms of consulting the people of Canada and the various persons involved.

I think that would go further than the current objective of the bill. I am not saying that the cost recovery procedure which has already been considered is constantly under scrutiny. We have already made some changes since 1984. In some sectors, as you undoubtedly know, our activities in the world market are growing, and throughout the years we will often have to review our general cost policy affecting producers as well as processors.

The Chairman: Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

For your information, sir, as a senator from New Brunswick I am particularly interested in the potato industry.

I feel that this legislation is being rammed down our throats. I have many questions for you, but I will stick to essentials, based on the complaints I have received, especially during my 16-year career as a member of Parliament.

Having kept in close touch with the potato industry, I am quite familiar with it just as Senator Bonnell knows quite well the potato growers in Prince Edward Island.

I don't know if you have the text of the speech made by Senator Robertson on second reading of the bill but, in any case, I will quote an excerpt from it. She said:

There is also a need to provide flexibility in the act to permit exemptions where enforcement of the legislation is undesirable or impractical.

In the following paragraph, she said:

In addition, fresh fruit and vegetable packers and processors sometimes require temporary exemption from packaging and grade requirements when Canadian produce is not available.

The words I have trouble with are: "when Canadian produce is not available".

Potato processors in the Atlantic region have in the past invoked that argument to get from the government permission to import in bulk American-grown potatoes although the real problem was a dispute over prices with the producers.

What guarantee does this legislation give us against this kind of argument, which on occasion is less than truthful and which strains people's credibility.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I am glad Senator Corbin raised this issue. As a former member of the House of Commons for several years, you are certainly aware that this problem does not exist only in the potato industry and the fruit and vegetable industry. I suggest it is the government's responsibility to make sure that processors and producers can operate with a measure of freedom. It should intervene only if one or the other of the interested parties does not follow the rules of the game.

If I may, I should like to use as an example the poultry industry, which is not bound by those rules, where processors often ask producers for poultry of a certain weight, say, three pounds and a half or four pounds and a half, when they know that they are not available. The next day, or the very same day, they may change their minds and ask the Department of External Affairs to import, maybe not in bulk but in large quantities, cheaper goods from the United States. We have to watch them.

In the case of poultry, the Canadian Marketing Board keeps an eye on this type of transaction. The Department of External Affairs has means to do that.

We are experiencing the same kind of situation possibly with potatoes, fruits and vegetables. We have the necessary means to make sure that the parties are playing fair and that we are not taken for a ride.

I am not in a position to state outright that there will be no sinners tomorrow morning in the Canadian food industry. Some people will probably try to by-pass the legislation! The purpose of this bill is to update the legislation and make sure that our controls can prevent this kind of thing.

You will probably agree with me when I say that if the problem you raised occurred in the past, it is certainly less frequent nowadays. Efforts are being made at least to limit as much as possible this type of situation. It has become the exception.

I admit that our responsibility is to watch out for this kind of thing. We are trying, as every government should. I cannot guarantee that some people will not try to abuse this bill whose objectives, you will surely agree, are certainly praiseworthy under the circumstances.

Senator Corbin: Mr. Minister, I understand quite well your example with the poultry industry. It is an industry which is well structured and organized. It is an industry where the producer is protected.

Such has not been the case in the past and such is not the case now in the potato industry. All sorts of strong-arm tactics and pressures are being used to set up a potato marketing board in Eastern Canada. It is not easy and I suppose you know something of this.

In my opinion, this does not prevent the type of situation which occurred in the past. Such a situation may repeat itself as long as we have no marketing board and as long as the parties involved, whether producers, processors or shippers, do not agree on basic rules.

I have always been suspicious of the exemption power granted to the minister or his officials acting on his behalf. You touched on this point a moment ago. People are under pressure, and as human beings, they are fallible. They create situations which generally benefit processors at the expense of producers. Producers always foot the bill, especially in times of surpluses. They did in the past anyway. Let us say that I raise the red flag on this issue. It is a problem which I shall continue to monitor closely. I suggest that if these new regulations do not succeed, with the potential establishment of a potato marketing board, in ensuring the orderly management of this industry, we will have to deal again with this in the near future.

Mr. Minister, do you have the required personnel to implement this legislation?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate those remarks on the potato industry. I understand that it is not the specific purpose of the bill. I think you will recognize with me the combined efforts in that area. It is not easy. Unfortunately, we cannot say too much on the issue currently before the courts. We did not really want things to get that far. We will spare no efforts to ensure stability in that sector. I am personally very receptive to your comments.

As for what you referred to, the somewhat flexible implementation of the legislation could sometimes allow for greater flexibility and more temporary exemptions for some processors. We are still seeking the Horticultural Council's advice on this issue. We are working very closely with federations which also include producers.

We must remain careful. You will no doubt agree with me that we must maintain a balance between the processors and the producers. For instance, if a processor doesn't have the basic material he needs to provide work for his hundreds of employees, we would do a disservice to society by forcing him to lay off his whole staff simply because the goods to be processed are temporarily unavailable even though the producer has a specific market. We must take this into account although our first priority would be to ensure our producers' survival.

All personnel needed to implement the legislation is in place since there is no real change to what already exists. We should be able to meet the requirements, as we did in the past, and we will take the necessary measures to improve or increase staff as needed.

Senator Corbin: Mr. Minister, I asked you this question in connection with the deregulation of the trucking industry in this country. For all practical purposes, our borders are now wide open. I think we will be exposed to larger volumes of traffic of the kind that concerns us here, and I am referring to dumping or pseudo-dumping or whatever we are supposed to call it. The problem is mainly with consignment selling.

As you know, trucks don't like to travel empty. When a Canadian truck goes to the United States, if it can come back with a full load of cherries, tomatoes or cucumbers, it will, even if a buyer still has to be found. So because of the deregulation of the trucking industry, I think there will a lot more consignment selling of imported products. Hence my next question: Do you have enough staff at the border to handle the increased volume?

Mr. Blais: You are referring to a problem that tends to fluctuate. As trade expands between our two countries, obviously imports and exports of fruits and vegetables or agri-food products between our two countries will continue to increase. I think this is dictated by the present state of the market.

In this respect, we work closely with Canada Customs. We have harmonized our inspection methods with customs procedures. We have also harmonized them for other industries, and I was referring earlier to meat inspection.

So far, I have no information that we might have a shortage of personnel or be unable to meet demand.

I realize that increased truck traffic between our two countries may involve more entries of products, just as it will increase the volume of products leaving the country. We have a duty to ensure that the law is observed at all times. I did not mention this specifically, but you mentioned that we might get products that are not always top quality, and we intend to watch that. It works both ways.

We control the products we export. You have seen this yourself for many years, and it is still the case. We set high standards for the quality of our exports. We are always proud of the products we sell to any country.

Canadians also want quality products. From time to time there is pressure on us to be more flexible about quality, but we have no intention of giving in. We will maintain our standards. Our officers take this very seriously, and for me it definitely is a priority. It is also a priority for this government.

Senator Corbin: Mr. Minister, I want to thank you for your answers. Finally, I have just a simple question. I didn't really have time to examine the bill in detail, and I imagine you understand why, in the circumstances.

Mr. Blais: Of course.

Senator Corbin: Will the new legislation and regulations be able to do anything about incidents like the dumping of Newfoundland cucumbers on the Nova Scotia market? You know what happened. Greenhouse cucumbers sold in Nova Scotia at rock bottom prices almost ruined producers in that province and elsewhere in Canada. Does this bill apply to interprovincial trade?

● (1550)

Mr. Blais: Your question is interesting. I have not checked into it. My officials tell me that some shipments were refused because the products did not comply with the normal rules of trade that apply in our country regarding the quality of the product marketed, particularly in terms of size. That is why these products were banned.

Our department is following the situation very closely. Obviously, this whole issue of interprovincial transit of food and agricultural products is important. You will agree with me that often we have fairly high barriers between some provinces for various products. In some cases, it is justified; in others, not.

We are monitoring this very closely. It is the federal government's duty to ensure as free movement as possible of products between the provinces but the quality of the products being shipped must also be maintained, I think. The quality must meet Canadians' requirements and, I would say, basic standards. I do not have all the figures on arrivals, because I did not expect this question, but I know that a good number were refused because of the size of those famous cucumbers that everyone has heard about.

Senator Corbin: Mr. Chairman, excuse me. I thought that would be my last question, but I would like to raise another point.

Regarding national trade marks, as you call them in clause 15 of the bill, I have not had time to consider it in detail.

Will this bill or the regulations under it apply to some trade practices that I would call, perhaps, not quite honest? I will illustrate with a concrete example. For years, potato distributors in Quebec bought New Brunswick potatoes and bagged them in Quebec for resale or distribution in Quebec, Ontario or elsewhere, and they still do that. They also buy a lot of potatoes from Prince Edward Island. These potatoes are shipped in bulk from Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick and cross provincial boundaries to reach St-Romuald in the Québec-Lévis area or some other place where the potatoes are put into bags bearing trade marks. I have seen this in regions around here and in Quebec. The origin of the product is usually written in very small type. This gives the consumer the impression of buying a Quebec potato, when it really comes from New Brunswick, which produces excellent potatoes, or Prince Edward Island, which is fairly close to New Brunswick in quality. The fact is that the consumer has the feeling that he is buying a Quebec potato, when that is not the case. It seems to me that this trade practice is, I will not say unfair, but on the borderline of the acceptable standards. Will you correct this kind of practice so that a potato grower called Michaud or Caron or Gillespie from the Grand-Sault region of New Brunswick can have credit for the product he has marketed?

Mr. Blais: I hope, honourable senators, that people who package their products almost under false pretenses do not do so because Quebec products sell better. That is surely not the reason. When someone buys a product, whatever it is, that person must know where it comes from. If this minimum standard is not respected, that is fraud, which is punishable under the Criminal Code. Between outright fraud and perfect honesty, there are surely people who, from what you tell me, take containers or packages marked in very small type or not clearly identified, so that people can really be mistaken and fail to distinguish between the marketer and the producer. That mistake may occur. I think that the rules are there to be respected. If people occasionally do not respect them, we must intervene from time to time. I do not have a recent example of where this has happened.

Perhaps the bulk arrivals that you were just talking about, honourable senators, have decreased somewhat for that reason. You will agree that the marketing is done differently by the three provinces you just spoke of. The company that you just mentioned also changed hands recently. The producers themselves do the marketing.

Senator Corbin: I did not name anyone.

Mr. Blais: No, I know. But I am very familiar with the whole issue of potatoes. I am aware that this can happen. We will take corrective action. I have been alerted to this problem and I will check into it. Certainly we will do everything in our power to enforce the law and make them understand that is no way to act.

The same thing can happen with many other products. Like it or not, we always run the risk of having this problem with any merchandise or foodstuff that can be sold in bulk. It is very easy to put a product in a bag and two potatoes are hard to distinguish as to their origin. We will monitor this closely. I thank you for your concern because it is really an important aspect of interprovincial trade.

Senator Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Minister. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

• (1600)

[English]

Senator Hays: First, let me join with others in welcoming the minister on this, the occasion of his first visit to the Senate. I had the privilege of attending the World Food Conference with the minister and would like to compliment him here, as I did at that time, on how well he represented Canada on that occasion. He has served us well there, and I think he is serving us well with respect to the legislation before us.

I have a couple of questions that I would like to put. They are a little off topic in terms of the preceding questions, but the first concerns what the bill is intended to address. Clearly, the problems that arise out of the ruling of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations are being addressed—that is, that there was no power to enact marketing legislation necessary to deal with problems that we had always intended to deal with. That clearly is covered. We are doing that and have had a good description from the government sponsor of the bill here in the Senate on what will happen there.

However, another objective of the bill is to meet obligations under Article 708 of the Free Trade Agreement, which are picked up in clauses 48 and 49 of Bill C-130. If that is in fact the case, it would be an example of amending existing legislation to deal with legislation that has not yet been passed.

In any event, my question is: Am I correct? Is this bill dealing with matters that are to be dealt with pursuant to Bill C-130, as well remedying the problems that arise out of the ruling of the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations?

Mr. Blais: What clause of the bill are you referring to?

Senator Hays: Article 708 of the Free Trade Agreement deals with technical regulations and standards for agricultural food, beverages and certain related products. Part IV of Bill C-130 is headed "Related and Consequential Amendments to Implement the Agreement, Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act". An example in the legislation of something that would come within the ambit of that would be clauses 13 and 14 of Bill C-141, dealing with registered establishments and accredited laboratories. There may be other parts of it that deal with the trade agreement as well.

We are dealing with problems that arise out of the ruling of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, but it seems that we are also dealing with Bill C-130, a bill that has not been passed. I want to confirm that and, if that is the case, ask where else the bill deals with things outside of what it is that we have been talking about for the most part today.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Yes, there are other bills being studied at this time. One of them in fact may be sent to us within a few hours; whether or not it comes here depends on the decision of members in the other place. I think there is no actual link between the two bills as such.

You referred to clauses 13 and 14 that deal with "Registered Establishments and Accredited Laboratories". It really is a coincidence, when you read both clauses. They are not really related to the broader legislation on free trade. It all depends on the situation, of course, and, as I usually say, we will cross that bridge when we get to it. Should the legislation come here in the future, you will have ample time to study it and I am convinced that you will study that other act with all of the energy that it deserves. But as we speak there is really no link between the two. The objective of this legislation, as you emphasized earlier, is rather to deal with what had been designated as being ultra vires. It was the government's responsibility to ensure that this legislation met with inspection needs. We took the opportunity to tie up certain loose ends and to ensure that this legislation complied in all of its provisions with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, for all of the meat inspection sector. That is really the primary objective of the act. Should adjustments become necessary in the future because of other legislation, we will simply follow the usual process of legislative amendment. The intent is not to change anything in Bill C-141, as Bill C-130 will, I think, be submitted to you in the coming weeks.

[English]

Is it clause 41 in Bill C-130?

Senator Hays: Part IV of Bill C-130, clauses 48 and 49.

Mr. Blais: Yes, it is really a coincidence that those clauses are the same.

Senator Hays: So the problem would be fortuitously solved by this coincidence—that is, of complying with the requirements of Bill C-130 along with dealing with the other problems.

I have another question that I feel obliged to ask. It is extraordinary that we are dealing with Bill C-141 in such a short time frame. I was out of the chamber briefly, so if this question has been answered, please tell me and I will leave it. Could you describe for us the extent to which consultation with the industries affected took place prior to finalizing this legislation?

● (1610)

I ask that question because in the normal course of events the parliamentary process allows the industry ample opportunity for input and so on. I understand the reason for the urgency and I concur with others that we should give this bill third reading either today or tomorrow. However, I am anxious to satisfy myself that there has been adequate consultation. As I say, if you have answered that question, you can tell me so, but, if not, I would like to know what kind of consultation took place prior to finalization of Bill C-141.

Mr. Blais: If I remember correctly, I answered that question earlier. We have had full consultation with the provinces, with the processors, with the industry and with producers everywhere in Canada, and everyone agrees with this legislation.

[Mr. Blais.]

However, I cannot really tell you if there is any organization or person who is against it.

Naturally, since this is a very technical bill, everyone has checked to see if it meets his goals, and it seems that everything is in order.

Senator Hays: The question that follows is: Is there a reason you can give us as to why it was made public only on June 30?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: You mean stating publicly that the legislation was only tabled in the House of Commons on June 28 or 29? I am not sure as to the specific date.

You know as well as I do, of course, that we currently have a lot of legislation under way. As under any other government, we are faced with heavy schedules. This is an important piece of legislation—as they all are, depending on whose point of view.

We felt at that point, Mr. Wise and I, that we should introduce the bill in the other place for discussion. We all are aware this is a priority, but, as will often happen, we all are faced with very heavy legislative schedules.

It is difficult to make a value judgment on such a matter. I have no adequate answer to give you. For a government, as you know, there always comes a time when everything is important, depending on whom you are talking to.

[English]

Senator Hays: I have one other question that has to do with animal products and the extent to which you anticipate passing regulations dealing with the marketing of animal products under this particular bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: On this matter, we are dealing strictly with cattle grading. I am not sure whether you were here at that stage, senator, but as I already mentioned, within a maximum 15 days after the bill is passed, the regulations should be in place within a very short time. That period should not extend over 10 to 14 days in our estimate. But this concerns cattle grading exclusively.

[English]

Senator Hays: So I take it that it is premature now to comment on the degree to which animal products will be regulated or dealt with in the regulations. Is that your answer?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: As I also had an opportunity to mention previously, there will be no real changes, senator. This is rather technical. To a large extent we will be keeping the same approach as we had previously, as far as those various regulations are concerned. There will be no surprises.

We will simply update a few regulations, but essentially they will remain the same.

[English]

Senator Hays: I would ask for a general comment on how the matter of search and seizure is dealt with differently in this legislation than in the legislation it replaces.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Your question is interesting, senator. Indeed there have been some changes. We made sure that, in the matter of search and seizure in people's homes under this legislation, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is complied with in every respect.

Some adjustments were required to ensure compliance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As I mentioned earlier, I think it is more technical. We are going to do whatever is necessary, as we have done in the past. Personally, I had requested it in my department. Obviously, no abuses have been reported. Specific directives have even been issued to prevent abuses.

I think that, as with any legislation, we must provide for the coercive resources necessary to implement this bill. There is no real change in this area except to make the legislation conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[English]

Senator Hays: My last question relates to the matter of standardization and whether or not you envisage this legislation assisting in any way in addressing problems that we have within Canada which really are non-tariff barriers to interprovincial trade. By that I mean the kind of situation Senator Corbin was talking about with respect to cucumbers, the implication being that cucumbers are heavily subsidized in one province and are shipped into another province at a price that is artificially low, thus causing harm to marketers of that product in the province which imports them. Is there any aspect of this bill that would deal with those kinds of problems?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Senator, I understand your concerns about the tariff and non-tariff barriers which exist, I suppose, throughout the world and in our own country. We are aware of that. As you know, it is a constant concern of our government.

However, that has nothing to do with the existing product and quality standards which have to be met. I don't know if we can call this "quality". For example, I was talking earlier about cucumbers, which you also mentioned.

Actually, when cucumbers do not meet the standards, which was the case for the Newfoundland products sent to Nova Scotia, the incoming or in transit products are not accepted. And that is what we will continue to do.

The object of this bill is not really to lower or to raise the barriers between the provinces. We are however aware of this phenomenon and we are doing everything we can to settle the matter. I suppose you can appreciate the fact that it is not always easy for us to have the barriers lowered to the utmost so as to allow a freer distribution of the food and agricultural products in our country, in the best interests of producers from all provinces.

[English]

Senator Hays: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Honourable Senator Barootes in the Chair:

The Chairman: Honourable senators, are there any other questions of the minister? If there are no other questions, honourable senators, is it your wish to proceed to discussion and approval of the bill, clause by clause?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1620)

The Chairman: Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: We have from clause 3 to clause 42. Do you wish to examine them independently?

Senator Doody: Carry them in one block.

Senator Frith: I agree.

The Chairman: Then shall clauses 3 to 42, inclusive, carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister and officials, on behalf of the Senate I wish to thank you very much for coming and helping us with the consideration of this bill in such a lucid and fair manner, so much so that even the present chairman could understand exactly what was being said.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-141, to regulate the marketing of agricultural products in import, export and interprovincial trade and to provide for national standards and grades of agricultural products, for their inspection and grading, for the registration of establishments and for standards governing establishments, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTIETH REPORT REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixtieth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (printing requests: submission by the Ottawa Citizen) presented on July 5, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a couple of questions to the mover of the motion? The sixtieth report, which, incidentally, is being adopted before the fifty-seventh, the fifty-eighth and the fifty-ninth reports—

Senator Frith: I do not mind if we put this report after the others. It is only before the Senate now because of our procedure in calling the orders.

Senator Phillips: The sixtieth report refers to two separate items. The second item refers to the allegations made by the Ottawa Citizen against Senator Argue. Is this the final report? If so, what safeguards were put into effect to avoid a repetition of this nature?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this report deals only with the submission by the lawyers of the Ottawa Citizen to attend Senate committee hearings and their request that the Ottawa Citizen be represented by its counsel before the committee. It does not deal with anything more than that and therefore the honourable senator's second question does not require an answer.

Senator Phillips: Will further explanations on this matter from the Internal Economy Committee be presented to the Senate?

Senator Frith: Explanations about what?

Senator Phillips: About the allegations with regard to expenditures.

Senator Frith: I do not know.

Senator Phillips: My second question refers to the first part of the report concerning printing requests. At the previous meeting, the fifty-ninth meeting of the committee, the members rejected a request from Senator Hastings for printing. The sixtieth report, after a question of privilege by Senator Hastings, has reversed the decision taken at the fifty-ninth meeting. I believe the Senate is entitled to an explanation in this regard, and I would suggest to the honourable senator that the report be held in abeyance until Senator Hastings, who is absent from Ottawa on committee business, has a chance to explain to the Senate this matter concerning his request.

[The Hon. the Speaker:]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips exchanges the words "fifty-ninth meeting" and "fifty-ninth report". I do not think there is anything in the fifty-ninth report, which will be called later today, that deals with the matter concerning Senator Hastings. In fact, that report deals with the budget of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. I am aware of no report dealing with a decision with regard to Senator Hastings' matter. Senator Hastings is not mentioned in the sixtieth report, although it is quite right that paragraph one of the sixtieth report is the result of a request by Senator Hastings; it deals with the general principle, not with Senator Hastings' application.

Senator Phillips: Is the honourable senator saying that the committee did not reverse itself?

Hon. H.A. Olson: That is right. It did not. It was a misinterpretation of what the vote was about.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, what I am saying is what I said.

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in an effort to give Senator Hastings an opportunity to explain to the Senate his request for printing, I move the adjournment of the debate until he returns.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the motion to adjourn, it seems to me that it is based on an irrelevant consideration, because Senator Hastings is not mentioned in the sixtieth report in any way. It may be that Senator Hastings has something to say to the Senate and it may be that Senator Phillips has something to raise in reference to the matter concerning Senator Hastings, but there is nothing in the sixtieth report about Senator Hastings. So I think that this is a bad reason on which to adjourn the debate on this motion. Perhaps there is another reason, but the reason described does not seem to have anything to do with the report.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Has the honourable senator adjourned the debate?

Senator Frith: I am speaking to the motion to adjourn, but I am sure that we can suspend that matter if Senator Lang wishes to speak to the report itself.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I think it is unfair to ask me, or perhaps any other senator present, to approve a report which is really quite incomprehensible in its wording. I do not know what the words "honour system" in paragraph one mean. I do not know whether the honourable senator can define that phrase, but I cannot take it at face value as having some sort of validity. In the second paragraph, I do not know what the words "that the submission"—that is, the submission of the lawyers of the Ottawa Citizen—"does not need a verbal clarification" mean. Before I can consider acceding to this report I want to know what the report means. I have certainly had no clarification to date.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that is a perfectly good reason for adjourning the debate, especially if Senator Lang or some other senator in the debate wishes to put on the record some questions for clarification. Perhaps it is a basis for referring the matter back to the committee. I think that is quite in order. That may be what Senator Phillips would also like to have occur.

● (1630)

I was simply saying that to base the adjournment of the debate on this motion by Senator Hastings, it seemed to me, was not a good reason for doing so, but to adjourn the debate in order to ask for further explanations or to have the committee reconsider the matter is, to me, a legitimate reason to adjourn the debate and I would not oppose such a motion

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I should like to ask Senator Frith what will change, if anything, if this report is not adopted. Will it be business as usual in the Senate or not?

Senator Frith: That is a little difficult to answer. I am sure that, if this report is not adopted, it will still be business as usual in the Senate chamber.

Senator Corbin: Or for senators.

Senator Frith: Yes. However, if there is any feeling, for example, by senators that the staff should or should not have the right to tell a senator when they will print in accordance with a request from a senator, that might cause a change. My reading of the first paragraph of the sixtieth report of the committee is that a senator is expected only to make the request and that the staff is to "... accede to the requests of all Senators made in the course of carrying out their senatorial duties." I do not think that paragraph is totally without effect. It may not be clear in its meaning, as Senator Lang says, but I think it will have an effect.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I also should like to express some lack of understanding of this report. What bothers me, quite apart from not understanding its meaning, is that I do not feel that this report treats one of the members of this house properly or fairly. He has apparently been accused in the press—although I did not read it—of certain improprieties, and I do not think that the kind of defence shown in this report does anything for Senator Argue. At the very least, he is entitled to the defence of this house to the effect that he has done nothing improper. I think he should be well defended. This report does nothing: it does not defend him and it does not accuse him. It simply comes out with these rather difficult words that make it difficult to understand what it means. It uses phrases like "the honour system", in the first paragraph, and, in the second paragraph, it states, "... does not need a verbal clarification." I may be terribly stupid, but I simply do not understand what that means.

Senator Frith: That is perhaps because Senator Molson and other senators seem to look at the sixtieth report as a report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to deal with or settle the allegations made against Senator Argue, and it is not intended to do that.

The first paragraph is a general response to a request by Senator Hastings for printing. It is not in response to anything to do with Senator Argue.

The second paragraph is only in response to a specific request that did deal with Senator Argue. It was a specific request from the Citizen, asking that the proceedings of the Internal Economy Committee be held in public and, if the committee did not wish to hold them in public, the Citizen would like to appear before the committee to explain why they ought to be held in public. They were told to make a written submission to that effect; they did so, and the committee decided that it did not have to hear from them because it took their written submission into account.

Honourable senators, I am not resisting the adjournment of the debate. It seems to me the problem with the sixtieth report is that it followed directly in our proceedings the statement made by Senator Argue. Senators, quite understandably, thought that "B" followed "A" and that "B" was meant to deal with "A". It was not.

Senator Molson: Is this matter to be raised in the Internal Economy Committee or any other committee, or is the matter now dead? I think that situation is not very clear to some of us here or to the public. It does not seem to me that we are dealing with the matter raised in the press. Surely we have to deal with it in some sensible way and not leave it in limbo.

Senator Frith: I agree, but that is not what the sixtieth report deals with.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, the first paragraph of the sixtieth report, with respect to printing requests and the use of other Senate facilities, states that:

... all Senators are on the honour system and staff will accede to the requests of all Senators made in the course of carrying out their senatorial duties.

I would ask the deputy chairman if there are any guidelines establishing the honour system that will be observed. For example, in the other place I understand that they have to follow rather elaborate guidelines for mailings and things of that nature and that the honour system applies there as well, but only, presumably, within the bounds of the guidelines that are established.

My question, again, is: Has the committee, or the Senate, established any guidelines within which the honour system will be observed, or is it carte blanche in that each senator will decide what he can and will do in accordance with his own conscience and observance of his honour?

Senator Frith: In response to the first question, which is: "Are there any guidelines within which the honour system is to operate?", I must say that there are no guidelines that I know of. However, as a member of the committee, I have heard of such guidelines, but, at the same time, a question was raised as to whether they had ever been written down.

As to whether it is carte blanche, I would have to try to interpret paragraph 1. I was not chairman of the committee when this report was written. I am reporting as deputy chairman and can only interpret what I recall as being the meaning of paragraph 1, which was that the senator should be accountable. What I am doing now is giving my impression of what the discussion was in committee. It was that any request should be made by the senator; the senator should take responsibility for that request; and the staff should accede to the request and not be in the position of trying to police the senator.

My own opinion is, if that is so, then all the information on the expenses attendant upon such a request should be available to the public and the senator should have the responsibility to account for those expenses. However, that aspect is an addition to my opinion, because the paragraph itself is certainly open to the interpretation of Senator McElman's that it is carte blanche. If it is carte blanche—and, remember, I am reporting the decision of the committee—and if senators have a right to ask for the printing of material and to make other requests in the course of carrying out their senatorial duties as they see them, then, in my opinion, since these are public funds, they also have the duty to defend the expenditures that are attendant upon them and not to leave it to the Internal Economy Committee to do that. However, that part is my opinion.

● (1640)

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I am not in any way trying to put Senator Frith on the spot. Unfortunately, I was unable to attend the meeting last Thursday. I do not often miss those committee meetings, and it is because I missed it that I should like to put the question to the deputy chairman. If the purpose was to remove from staff people, from senior bureaucrats, the responsibility for making decisions in these matters, I suggest that this paragraph 1 does not achieve that purpose altogether. It says:

... staff will accede to the requests of all Senators made in the course of carrying out their senatorial duties.

Is it not your impression that there could be cases in which the bureaucrats, the staff people, would reach a conclusion that things were being requested which did not fall within the scope of senatorial duties, but that they would still be obligated, for example, to report to our senior officer of the Senate, the Clerk, who in turn would be obligated to report to the Internal Economy Committee in any such instance?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, I agree with that. That is an additional reason why the Senate may wish to continue asking for clarification of these points and refer them back to the committee for clarification.

Senator Molson: I hate to repeat myself, but I am not clear on what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said with regard to this matter or on where this leaves our colleague. Does it leave it just the way it was? Unanswered? Nothing further said? Is that the end of the matter or is there anything else that is being done to help clear his name?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there was nothing specifically referred by the Senate to the Internal Economy Committee, as I recall it. The question came up because it was raised in the press. I believe the position taken by the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, the Speaker, in response to questions by the press, was that he understood that the issue raised was the recently established guidelines for senators on research assistants, and that is how it got to the Internal Economy Committee. When it came up in the Internal Economy Committee, I had the same questions in my mind as Senator Molson had, and I raised the point by saying, "What is it that is before the committee? Is someone being accused of something or not?" We then reviewed and discussed the guidelines. Then the question as it emerges in the sixtieth report got mixed up. Therefore, in the sixtieth report all we dealt with were totally different matters, a request by Senator Hastings and the request by the Ottawa Citizen.

If Senator Molson or any other senator were asking for my opinion as to how to bring this out of limbo, I would say that because of what happened yesterday, when Senator Argue rose on a point of privilege and responded to allegations made in the press, it seems to me that the Senate is now in a position to have that matter referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration if it wishes to do so. Or it can pass a motion stating that it accepts the explanation, or whatever, and the Senate can now consider that the matter is before it and then refer it back to the Internal Economy Committee.

● (1650)

Where the matter stands in the Internal Economy Committee is obscure, I agree, because the matter was never referred to the Internal Economy Committee by the Senate. The matter only arose as a result of the response by the chairman to the question on the research guidelines.

Senator Molson: I cannot help but feel that we are perhaps doing a disservice to the Senate and to Senator Argue by letting the matter drop. I am not sure what procedure would be suitable or advantageous, but I think for the public to know this much and then have the thing drop dead is really not in the best interests of the Senate or of Senator Argue.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think many senators share Senator Molson's view, and perhaps someone can come up with another suggestion. I came up with this suggestion on the spot. As Senator Molson knows very well as a former and long-serving chairman of the Rules Committee, the Committee on Privileges of the Senate is a committee of the whole Senate. So, if Senator Argue feels that his point of privilege should be responded to by the Senate, he might request that it do so; but I do not think it is at all out of order for another senator to say that he or she wants to consider the matter in the Senate as a whole, or that that senator would like the matter referred to the Internal Economy Committee for a report. I think a motion like that would be quite in order; but I am quite open to other suggestions.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, there is another aspect to this. Rather than wait for a reference from the Senate, this is one of the two committees of the Senate which can, of their own, institute a study or an investigation.

Now that Senator Argue has brought this matter—quite aside from what the newspaper said—into the public purview, it seems to me it is more than appropriate that the Internal Economy Committee look at the unanswered questions with respect to this matter—and there are unanswered questions, some of which, in my view, demand a response and demand an inquiry.

I remind honourable senators that each and every senator is entitled to attend meetings of the Internal Economy Committee, and those who are interested should attend and put in that committee any questions they may have on this matter. They can do everything other than present a motion or vote. They can otherwise participate fully. I, for one, hope that those senators who have questions in their minds will do that.

I can say to Senator Molson that, so far as I am concerned, this report does not close the issue in any sense; it simply deals with two separate matters that were before the committee and gives the conclusions reached by the committee on those two separate matters. The issues with respect to Senator Argue, in my view, have not been concluded in the committee, and it is my intention to see that they are not left as having been concluded in the committee, because I have questions I wish to obtain answers to. So I hope that the committee meeting scheduled for tomorrow morning will continue to make inquiries into this whole matter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator McElman is, of course, quite right when he says that this is one of the two committees that can consider matters on their own motions, and that is how the matter got before the Internal Economy Committee. The matter came up before that committee in precisely that way.

As a member of the Internal Economy Committee, I can say it would be helpful if we had some understanding from the Senate on the precision it requires in defining any matter. We do not even need a motion, because, as Senator McElman has stated, the committee can take into account what is said in the Senate in order to deal with it. Senator Argue's question of privilege raised in the Senate yesterday can be considered by the Internal Economy Committee. Then we have some document or something that can be used as a basis for the committee's consideration. Perhaps it would be better not to be any more precise than that.

If I understand Senator McElman's feelings on the subject, as echoed by others, he means to bring this matter up at the committee meeting scheduled for tomorrow morning. The committee can then consider the matter on its own motion and take into account what Senator Argue raised yesterday and everything that has been said today.

Senator McElman: If it is not already on the agenda for tomorrow morning's meeting, I will ask that it be placed on the agenda.

Senator Frith: Even if it is on the agenda for tomorrow's meeting, we should be sure we take into account, in my view, the comments made by Senator Argue yesterday and the interventions of today.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: There is a motion to adjourn the debate. It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that further debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: I think Senator Phillips and I understand each other now—that is, that the reason for adjourning the debate is not to await anything from Senator Hastings but just to clarify what the committee is trying to say. Is that right?

Senator Phillips: The motion will give the committee an opportunity to reconsider the sixtieth report.

Senator Frith: I would support a reference of this report back to the committee now rather than adjourning the debate, unless someone wants to add more to it. Can we change the motion?

Senator Phillips: I am agreeable.

Senator Frith: I think we will get at it more quickly if we do that.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is Senator Phillips withdrawing his motion and putting a second motion that the matter be referred back to the committee?

Senator Phillips: Yes. I move:

That the report be not now adopted but that it be sent back to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for further consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report referred back to committee.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIFTY-FIFTH AND FIFTY-SEVENTH TO FIFTY-NINTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On Orders Nos. 11, 12, 13 and 14:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I please speak to Orders Nos. 11, 12, 13 and 14 together? Those are the fifty-fifth, fifty-seventh, fifty-eighth and fifty-ninth reports of the Internal Economy Committee. To put it on the record, the fifty-sixth report was adopted on June 21, 1988, in case senators are wondering what happened to it. If I can deal with them en bloc, they are—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I will put the motion first.

Senator Frith: I was going to have you put an even wider motion, Mr. Speaker.

The fifty-fifth report deals with the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee study on childhood poverty; the fifty-seventh report concerns the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee's routine legislative matters and other matters referred to it; the fifty-eighth report has to do with the Energy and Natural Resources Committee and its general legislative program or such legislation as may be referred to it, and other matters; and the fifty-ninth report concerns the Energy Committee's examination of the production and use of natural gas.

I ask for leave to deal with those reports en bloc.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifty-fifth and the fifty-seventh to fifty-ninth reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration presented on Tuesday, June 28, 1988, approving supplementary budgets of the following committees:

- 55th Social Affairs, Science and Technology;
- 57th Legal and Constitutional Affairs;
- 58th Energy and Natural Resources;
- 59th Energy and Natural Resources.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that these reports be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 7, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-72, respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

RAILWAY SAFETY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Charles Turner, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 7, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-105, An Act to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 1st, 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendment:

Page 33, clause 35:

(a) Strike out lines 20 to 26 and substitute the following:

“35.(1) A person who holds a position in a railway company that is declared by regulations made under paragraph 18(1)(b) to be a position critical to safe railway operations (referred to in this section as a “designated position”) shall undergo a company-sponsored medical examination (including audiometric and optometric examination) at least every twelve months.

(2) Where a physician or an optometrist believes, on reasonable grounds, that a patient is a person described in subsection (1), the”

(b) Renumber subclauses (2) to (5), and any cross-references to subclauses (1) to (5), accordingly.

Respectfully submitted,

CHARLES TURNER
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Turner, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, ATLANTIC CANADA, 1987

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. William M. Kelly, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 7, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred on May 31, 1988 Bill C-103, An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, and to which instructions were given by an order of the Senate on June 7, 1988 to divide Bill C-103 into two bills, has, in obedience to both orders of reference examined the said bill and now reports that it has divided the bill into two bills, Bill C-103 (Part I), An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, and Bill C-103 (Part II), An Act to establish the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, both of which are set out in Appendices A and B respectively to this report.

Your Committee has agreed to report Bill C-103 (Part I), without amendment, and further reports that it is continuing its examination of Bill C-103 (Part II).

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM M. KELLY
Deputy Chairman

For text of appendices to report, see Appendix "A", p. 3894.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Doody: With leave, now.

If possible, I would like the Senate to deal as quickly as possible with this report, and then send it to the House of Commons so that they may deal with it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45 (1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, if I may, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate that this matter should be dealt with promptly—and I appreciate the fact that it is being dealt with promptly—so that members of the House of Commons will have an opportunity to deal with what, in effect, is an unprecedented situation.

You will recall that when Senator Graham presented his motion to split the bill members on this side of the Senate protested and voted against it. Subsequently, His Honour ruled that the motion to split the bill was out of order. The majority of the Senate thought otherwise and overruled the Speaker's decision. It is now up to the members of the House of Commons to decide whether or not this is, indeed, a constitutional challenge to the House of Commons or whether the splitting procedure is, indeed, acceptable.

I appreciate the opportunity to get this report out of the Senate and down to the House of Commons so promptly. We will now let them look after it.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government has been very brief in his comments with respect to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

In accordance with the instruction of the Senate itself, the committee proceeded to divide Bill C-103 into two bills: Bill C-103 (Part I) and Bill C-103 (Part II). The committee approved of the way the division took place.

Senator Flynn: They had no choice!

[Senator Doody.]

Senator MacEachen: The committee subsequently gave consideration to Bill C-103 (Part I).

It ought to be stated that that bill was reported unanimously out of committee to the Senate, and the Deputy Leader of the Government has now moved that the Senate concur in the report of the committee. I hope that motion will be carried; that, subsequently, third reading of the bill will be carried in the Senate; and that the House of Commons will be notified as quickly as possible that the ACOA bill, Bill C-103 (Part I), has been passed by the Senate. Indeed, if the House of Commons acts to accept the conclusions of the Senate, then ACOA will quickly have a firm legislative base.

It was the intention originally, in securing the dividing of the bill, to facilitate as quickly as possible the enactment of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. It was our conclusion that that would be achieved more quickly by dealing with the two subject matters separately than by dealing with them together. It is evident that more time will be required to consider the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation than was required for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, because the clarity of support that existed for the first entity is not apparent for the second.

• (1410)

Senator Flynn: To you!

Senator MacEachen: I believe that the fact that we have been able to report the bill and have it dealt with justifies the original decision.

Senator Flynn: Which one—second reading or the instruction to the committee?

Senator MacEachen: It is not my intention to revive the procedural question that was settled by the Senate when the motion to divide the bill was put. The House of Commons, of course, is master of its own destiny and of its own business. If it finds that procedural questions exist, which I do not find is the case, then, of course, it will delay the immediate enactment of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. It would be our desire to have that agency firmly established as quickly as possible.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, as a member of that committee, I should just like to remind honourable senators that those of us who worked in that committee, and who were distressed at the dividing of the bill in this chamber, felt the same way in committee. However, as the honourable senator has noted, we were dealing with instructions from the house to divide the bill and we were advised that there really was no way we could object at that point; we were following the orders of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Well said!

Senator Robertson: However, the government members on that committee feel no less strongly than they did when the decision to divide that bill was taken in this house. Certainly, I am somewhat amused—although it is nothing to be amused about, I suppose—when Senator MacEachen suggests that, should the House of Commons not approve of the division of this bill, they will indeed be delaying the enactment of ACOA. That is a farce; it really is a farce. Simply because certain members of this chamber want to divide this bill and frustrate the will of the government, I would be very much surprised that they could accept the blame for holding up the bill after the division here, a procedure which I understand is unprecedented in this chamber. I wanted that on the record. Thank you very much.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will repeat the motion:

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Report adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have here a little procedural nit.

Senator Doody: Let's pick it!

Senator Frith: Rule 78(4) says:

When a committee reports a bill without amendment, —which is what has happened here—such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Obviously, we will give leave that it be given third reading today.

Senator Doody: Of course.

Senator Flynn: Under the circumstances.

Senator Doody: I guess the moot point, if there is one, is whether or not that bill is amended or whether it is the same bill that went up to the committee a short while ago. There are those of us cynical enough to suggest that it is somewhat different.

Senator Frith: Yes; you are noted for your cynicism.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY BILL—BILL C-103 (PART I)

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill, Part I, be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Unanimously—despite Senator Robertson's indignation.

[Translation]

A Clerk at the Table: Bill C-103 (Part I), an Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts.

Third reading of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, Bill C-103 (Part I) a House of Commons bill entitled an Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts.

[English]

It is ordered:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate has divided the bill into two bills, Bill C-103 (Part I), An Act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, and Bill C-103 (Part II), An Act to establish the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and to make consequential and related amendments to other Acts, both of which are attached to this Message as Appendices A and B respectively; and

To further acquaint that House that: (a) the Senate desires the concurrence of the House of Commons in the division of Bill C-103; (b) the Senate has passed Bill C-103 (Part I), without amendment; and, (c) the Senate is further considering Bill C-103 (Part II).

Senator MacEachen: That is also unanimous!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: No, it is not. I think I should put on the record that the message has been prepared by the Chair and I do not think we necessarily concur unanimously in it.

Senator MacEachen: When the Speaker says, "It is ordered", is he not speaking on behalf of the Senate? When he says that the Senate desires the concurrence of the House of Commons, is the Speaker not speaking on behalf of the Senate? That is quite an extraordinary doctrine proposed by the Honourable Senator Flynn.

Honourable senators, this is in standard form. When the Speaker elucidates this order, he cannot speak for himself; he is speaking for the Senate.

Senator Flynn: In that case, I will move that the part of the message referring to the request for concurrence be deleted. We should inform the House of Commons that that is what we have done, but that we do not necessarily ask for concurrence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why?

Senator Flynn: Because we are not all in concurrence with that request. We simply passed that part of the bill. We are not asking for concurrence in everything that was contained in the message.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems to me that the polite thing to do is to ask for the concurrence of the House of Commons; but, if the government wishes it otherwise, that is all right.

Senator MacEachen: Take it out!

Senator Flynn: Sure!

Senator Frith: I thought we were being polite.

Senator Flynn: No, we do not ask for concurrence—that is not a question of politeness.

Senator Frith: I think we should ask for concurrence, but, if the government does not want us to, that is fine.

Senator Flynn: Personally, I do not want to.

Senator MacEachen: If it is the desire of Senator Doody, on behalf of the government, to alter the message to delete what are, in the mind of Senator Flynn, the offending words, “that the Senate desires the concurrence of the House of Commons in the division of Bill C-103”, then the message would read: “That the Clerk further acquaint the House that the Senate has passed Bill C-103 (Part I) without amendment, and that the Senate is further considering Bill C-103 (Part II).”

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

● (1420)

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I must say that when this particular formulation came to my attention I did not find it necessary to ask the House of Commons to concur in the division that was undertaken in the Senate. Some have argued that it might be polite or more courteous to render it in that way because the bill originated there, but what is important is not whether they concur in the division of the bill but whether, indeed, they will accept Bill C-103 (Part I) without amendment, which establishes the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Certainly, I would agree with Senator Flynn to remove, if he wishes, that portion of the message so that the House will not be explicitly asked to bless the division of the bill. Their decision will be based solely upon whether they want to approve the ACOA portion of the bill on its own merits.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

[Senator Flynn.]

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, July 12, 1988, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is the Deputy Leader of the Government in a position to tell us what business the government will have for us next week?

Senator Doody: The Official Languages Bill is here, which will have to be dealt with expeditiously. I suspect that the House of Commons may have an opportunity to deal with the message that we are sending down, and it may very well be back by Tuesday. There are also various other bills before the House of Commons which I hope to see next week.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Deputy Leader of the Government telling us in advance that the government has already decided not to pass Bill C-103 (Part I)? Has that decision been made by the government? If the message were accepted, then the bill would go forward for Royal Assent, and I am asking the Deputy Leader of the Government whether he is now telling us that there will be a further delay in the enactment of the ACOA legislation.

Senator Doody: I certainly did not want to give that impression. I said that the House of Commons will have had an opportunity to deal with it. I did not mean that they would accept it or reject it. I am not in a position to say so.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray is not with us today. I will be glad to take as notice any questions that honourable senators might wish to pose.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING TO MAINLAND—SUBMISSION OF PROPOSALS—NAMES OF COMPANIES OR CONSORTIA—FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—NATURE OF PROPOSALS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer. It is a rather lengthy one in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 15 last, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Prince Edward Island—Proposed Fixed Crossing to Mainland—Submission of Proposals—Names of Companies or Consortia—Financial Arrangements—Nature of Proposals. If Senator Stewart will agree, I will ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Last June, Public Works Canada called on Canadian firms to submit Expressions of Interest. Twelve responses were received and seven were pre-qualified and invited to submit proposals.

Dillingham Construction Limited, North Vancouver withdrew from the competition prior to submission of proposals. Six consortia responded.

The contact names and telephone numbers for the six consortia are attached.

Bridge solutions were submitted by:

Abegweit Crossing Ltd. - high level bridge;

The Borden Bridge Co. Ltd. - combination high level/segmental concrete and cable-stayed bridge;

P.E.I. Bridge Ltd. - high level bridge with a cable-stayed section over the navigation channel; and Strait Crossing Inc. - concrete bridge.

P.E.I. Crossing Venturers submitted two solutions; a cable-stayed bridge with a steel and concrete deck, and a vehicular tunnel with two unidirectional parallel tunnels.

Northumberland Bridge Corporation also submitted two solutions; a steel truss bridge, and a cable-stayed structure.

None of the proposals have causeway sections. The Generic Initial Environmental Evaluation (GIEE) which was completed March 1988 and distributed to the public concluded that a bridge given proper design would have no significant negative impacts on the fishery or the environment.

Concept drawings of each solution and corporate profiles and the Executive Summary of the GIEE is attached to this answer and is tabled for Senator Stewart's information.

The evaluation of proposals is currently underway by a joint federal and provincial government review committee aided by private sector specialists. The results of this confidential review will form part of a submission to Ministers.

The recommended development approach is as follows:

The proposed approach is for the private sector to finance, construct, own, operate and maintain a fixed crossing under a 35-year contribution agreement with the Government of Canada. At the end of the term, the facility would revert to the government in a fully maintained condition with 65 years of operating life still to run.

The developer would assume all construction, operation and maintenance risks and in return would receive an annual Consumer Price Index (CPI) linked subsidy. The subsidy would be payable annually in advance, from a date certain to be agreed upon for the whole term of 35 years (35 payments) whether or not the facility is completed or operating. The subsidy would be fully indexed from the time of acceptance of the offer. The developer would provide guarantees and insurance sufficient to reimburse the government for the subsidy in the event that the facility was not completed by the date certain or rendered inoperable from any cause. Should the facility be rendered inoperable due to a catastrophic event, the government would accept responsibility for meeting the constitutional obligation of "continuous communication" for the period of time that the facility is inoperable.

The developer would charge regulated tolls. The toll rates would be adjusted annually for 75 per cent of the CPI. Toll revenues would be "as collected" with an index linked "floor" equivalent to the toll revenue yield of the last year of the ferry operation fully indexed to the CPI. Should actual toll revenue in a particular year fall below the "floor", the developer could, by simple application to the government, be permitted to set toll rates at such a level above 75 per cent as would permit the developer to recoup the particular year's short fall in the succeeding year.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the third reading of Bill C-141, to regulate the marketing of agricultural products in import, export and interprovincial trade and to provide for national standards and grades of agricultural products, for their inspection and grading, for the registration of establishments and for standards governing establishments.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

7 July 1988

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérard V.J. La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 7th day of July, 1988, at 3.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy and Program

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Eileen Rossiter moved the second reading of Bill C-111, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to repeal certain enactments in consequence thereof.

She said: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to outline the amendments proposed to the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

Bill C-111 contains provisions which support the government's ongoing commitment to help house Canadians. The amendments focus on mortgage loan insurance and mortgage-backed securities, two government programs designed to encourage a continuing flow of investment funds for housing.

Other amendments in the bill are designed to ensure that the mortgage insurance fund operates effectively on a business-like basis in order that its enterprise nature be preserved. Incidental amendments are included to clarify wording and to repeal obsolete sections.

These amendments comprise part of an ongoing review by this government to ensure that, under federal housing policy, all Canadians have decent, adequate and affordable shelter.

A consultation paper on social housing policy was distributed to more than 8,000 Canadians in January 1985. Every major housing association responded. Intensive follow-up meetings were held with social housing and interest groups, industry and municipal associations, mortgage-lending institutions and organizations representing the poor, the elderly, the disabled and aboriginal peoples.

The results of that process, honourable senators, were new directions in social housing policy. Government funds are now being directed to those in greatest need and we are serving more truly disadvantaged Canadians than ever before. Through federal-provincial agreements and improved cost-sharing arrangements, more low-income housing is being provided, and with less bureaucratic red tape.

● (1430)

We now have, in partnership with the provinces, in excess of half a million social housing units in this country. Over time, through rehabilitation programs, we have helped save about 40,000 homes from deterioration and abandonment.

Indeed, since identifying national housing policy as an area of concern in 1984, this government has undertaken an examination of various aspects of housing policy. The social housing and subsequent mortgage insurance reviews were part of this, and we are now proceeding with a review of renovation policies and housing options for older Canadians and for those living in rural areas.

This consultation on policy matters has already proved useful in determining ways in which to better allocate the resources we have and in identifying those areas of housing policy that require the greatest attention. The changes announced last year resulted in lower mortgage premiums and fees—a boon to both homebuilders and purchasers. New provisions allowed for mortgage insurance for second mortgages, renovation, upgrading and improving the quality of the housing stock in Canada.

For the first time Canadians can finance this work at first mortgage rates rather than paying the premium normally associated with second mortgage rates. Other borrowers may use insured second mortgages to facilitate the assumption of low-interest-rate first mortgages. This has the effect of reducing overall financing costs when purchasing an existing home.

These were important changes for Canadians purchasing new and existing houses and helped ensure that all Canadians had access to mortgage financing on an equitable basis, regardless of where they lived. Equal access is fundamental to public mortgage insurance.

At that time the government also announced its intention to introduce legislation to provide even greater access to mortgage insurance: mortgage insurance for moveable homes.

For young couples, families of modest income, individuals such as young service people who, because of their jobs, must move frequently, a mobile home is often a sensible, affordable alternative to conventional stick-built housing.

In many respects, today's modern moveable homes are like wartime housing. They offer an affordable option to renting, help young families build a little equity—a nest egg—and give them a stepping stone to larger accommodation if their needs increase.

Retired people, often with families that have grown up and moved away, no longer need either the space or expense of a large home. Manufactured housing could prove to be an affordable option for many seniors, as it is elsewhere on this continent.

The Canadian Manufactured Housing Institute and La Société Québécoise des Manufacturiers D'Habitation have sought changes to the National Housing Act to make moveable homes equal to conventionally built houses for mortgage loan purposes. The government responded by introducing chattel mortgage insurance to improve the availability of this less expensive form of housing.

The benefits of extending this program are numerous, particularly for consumers. Because mortgage loan insurance removes the risk of default from the lender, a bank or trust company, the lender can offer a reduced interest rate on the financing loan.

For the homebuyer, even with the necessary premium, he is likely to receive substantial savings in interest payments. Other advantages will be improved borrowing terms and conditions, such as term, amount and amortization periods. This will put the buyer on the same basis as other Canadians who want new homes.

This insurance will be available throughout the country. Equal access is fundamental to public mortgage insurance.

There are other benefits as well. In response to a five-year experimental program of mortgage insurance for new moveable homes, the industry has committed itself to enhancing its warranty programs. As a result, consumers will have the added assurance of a quality built home.

The indirect benefits will be equally important. Mortgage lenders will have the opportunity of targeting a new market.

Because the construction of mobile homes need not be at the home site, work does not stop when winter sets in, as is the case with traditional residential construction in some parts of Canada. Consequently, the seasonal nature of home construction does not apply to manufactured housing. Thus, it provides year-round employment—certainly a boon to the local community.

These new features of mortgage loan insurance will improve access to homeownership to many more Canadians, without involving any direct government expenditures. As we expand the range of affordable homes, scarce government resources can be directed to those whose needs are greatest.

The second significant amendment is in keeping with the traditional role of government support for housing. It, too, is a direct result of consultations with financial institutions and the housing industry and is a natural extension of the many consumer-driven changes we have seen in mortgage financing over the past decade.

Last year the government introduced a new investment instrument, designed to further encourage a steady flow of mortgage financing for housing. Mortgage-backed securities assist in providing longer-term, fixed-rate mortgages for homebuyers and they facilitate a secondary market in mortgages. This adds to the overall supply of mortgage funds. For investors, they provide monthly payments of principal and interest at a rate of return competitive with other long-term securities. Under the National Housing Act they have the added benefit of a government guarantee of timely payment.

The amendment we have before us will allow approved lenders to insure qualified mortgages they already hold to facilitate the establishment of mortgage pools for the creation of mortgage-backed securities. This should substantially increase the quantity of securities available for investment and further support the development of a mature secondary mortgage market in Canada.

These securities are ideal for Canadians planning their retirement, and approximately 80 per cent of all sold to date have been purchased by individuals, probably a good portion of which were for registered retirement savings plans.

The impact on future financing for housing may be as great as mortgage insurance has been. Current projections are for a total of $1 billion-worth to be sold this year. They are equally valuable in helping those in greatest need, while contributing to reducing the deficit. Already $65 million of mortgage-backed securities are being used to help finance government-funded social housing in British Columbia during 1988. This is of particular benefit in social housing, as the use of mortgage-backed securities allows funds to be made available at reduced interest rates, which in turn reduces the level of subsidy required for social housing projects. It is expected that other provinces will follow British Columbia into this field. Over time, substantial savings of tax dollars may be realized throughout the country. The mortgage-backed securities program can increase the number of financing options for homebuyers.

Honourable senators, I should like to conclude by emphasizing the importance of dealing with this bill as expeditiously as possible. Affordable, adequate housing is a key factor in the quality of life in this country. The amendments will assist in achieving these objectives to the benefit of even more Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I first want to congratulate Senator Rossiter on her lucid explanation of Bill C-111. We support this legislation. We believe that it is in the public interest and we believe that passing it quickly will help the Canadian taxpayers who stand to benefit from it. We believe that the amendments updating the original bill are timely and support the fact that there is a noticeable improvement in the time within which services are provided.

I think Senator Rossiter would probably agree that this bill is not enough to solve the many problems that exist in housing in this country and that it does not do enough for the many Canadians who are waiting for social housing. I am sure that Senator Rossiter knows, as do all senators, that there is a shortage of decent, cheap housing for people of middle and low incomes.

But, certainly, half a loaf is better than none, especially when dealing with a problem of this dimension. It needs also to be said that some of the measures that are necessary to solve the housing problems in this country lie with other jurisdictions, such as the provinces and the municipalities, and that the problem is not one that is totally solvable by the federal government. However, we would like to think that this legislation is a mark of good faith on the part of the government. We would like to think that the government is concerned about social housing and that it will cooperate in finding solutions that go beyond this legislation.

● (1440)

The bill, as honourable senators know, passed all three stages in the other place in a single day. Considering that we will likely give unanimous support to this bill, one might think that it ought to be adopted quickly. However, there is a traditional role for the Senate with this bill of 28 pages and 37 clauses. Although it addresses directly a rather obvious problem, it is not a simple bill. I believe it should be examined in committee; according to rule 67(m)(vii), "housing" should go to the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee. I therefore request of Senator Rossiter that she refer the bill, if it receives second reading forthwith, as I believe it should, unless some other senator wants to adjourn the debate, to that committee before it receives third reading.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Rossiter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3.30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gerard V. J. La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987 (Bill C-131, Chapter 26, 1988)

An Act to regulate the marketing of agricultural products in import, export and interprovincial trade and to provide for national standards and grades of agricultural products, for their inspection and grading, for the registration of establishments and for standards governing establishments (Bill C-141, Chapter 27, 1988)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 12, 1988, at 2 p.m.

CORPORATION ESTABLISHED

Corporation established

3. A corporation is hereby established to 35 be called the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, consisting of a Board of Directors comprised of the President, the Vice-President and five other directors to be appointed in the manner provided in subsection 3(2). 40

Vice-President

4. (1) The Vice-President shall be appointed by the Governor in Council for such term as the Governor in Council deems appropriate and may be removed at any time by the Governor in Council. 45

CONSTITUTION DE LA SOCIÉTÉ

Composition

3. Est constituée la Société d'expansion du Cap-Breton, dotée de la personnalité morale et formée d'un conseil d'administration de 35 sept membres, dont le président de l'Agence de promotion économique du Canada atlantique et le vice-président, nommés conformément au paragraphe 3(2).

4. (1) Le gouverneur en conseil nomme à 40 titre amovible le vice-président pour le mandat qu'il estime indiqué.

Directors

(2) Each director, other than the President and the Vice-President, shall be appointed by the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to hold office for such term, not exceeding three years, as will ensure, as far as possible, the expiration in any one year of the terms of office of not more than one-half of the directors, but may be removed at any time by the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council.

(2) Le ministre, avec l'approbation du gouverneur en conseil, nomme à titre amovible chacun des autres administrateurs pour un mandat maximal de trois ans; les nominations sont faites, dans la mesure du possible, de façon que, chaque année, la moitié au plus des mandats arrive à expiration. Il peut les révoquer en cours de mandat avec l'approbation du gouverneur en conseil.

Autres administrateurs

Re-appointment

(3) The Vice-President is eligible for re-appointment on the expiration of a term of office, but, notwithstanding subsection 114(3) of the Financial Administration Act, any other director who has served two consecutive terms is not, during the twelve months following the completion of a second term, eligible for appointment except as President or Vice-President.

(3) Sous réserve du paragraphe (5), le mandat du vice-président peut être reconduit. Par contre, malgré le paragraphe 114(3) de la Loi sur l'administration financière et sauf s'il s'agit d'occuper le poste de président ou vice-président, les autres administrateurs ne peuvent, après une première reconduction, être nommés de nouveau qu'après douze mois suivant la fin de leur second mandat.

Reconduction

Vacancy

(4) A vacancy on the Board does not impair the right of the remaining directors to act but where any such vacancy occurs it shall be filled as soon as practicable by appointment in the manner provided in this section.

(4) Une vacance au sein du conseil n'entrave pas le fonctionnement de la Société, mais le poste vacant doit être rempli dès que possible conformément au présent article.

Vacance

President to preside at meetings

5. The President shall preside at meetings of the Board but in the event of the absence or incapacity of the President, or if the office of President is vacant, the Vice-President shall preside at such meetings.

5. Le président — ou, en cas d'absence ou d'empêchement de celui-ci ou de vacance de son poste, le vice-président — préside les réunions du conseil.

Présidence des réunions

Management vested in President

6. (1) The President is the chief executive officer of the Corporation and has, on behalf of the Board, the direction and control of the business of the Corporation with authority to act in the conduct of the business of the Corporation in all matters that are not by this Act or by the by-laws of the Corporation specifically reserved to be done by the Board.

6. (1) Le président est le premier dirigeant de la Société; à ce titre et au nom du conseil, il assure la direction de la Société. Il est investi à cet effet des pouvoirs qui ne sont pas expressément réservés au conseil par la présente loi ou les règlements administratifs de la Société.

Fonctions du président

Vice-President to be chief operating officer

(2) The Vice-President is the chief operating officer of the Corporation and has, on behalf of the President, the direction and control of the day-to-day operations of the Corporation with authority to act in the conduct of the business of the Corporation in all matters that are not by this Act or by the by-laws of the Corporation specifically reserved to be done by the Board or the President.

(2) Le vice-président est le directeur général de la Société; à ce titre et au nom du président, il assure la direction quotidienne des activités de la Société. Il est investi à cet effet des pouvoirs qui ne sont pas expressément réservés au conseil ou au président par la présente loi ou les règlements administratifs de la Société.

Fonctions du vice-président

Absence or incapacity of
Vice-President

(3) In the event of the absence or incapacity of the Vice-President, or if the office of Vice-President is vacant, the Board shall authorize an officer or director of the Corporation to act as the Vice-President for the time being, but no person so authorized by the Board has authority to act as Vice-President for a period exceeding sixty days without the approval of the Governor in Council.

(3) En cas d'absence ou d'empêchement du vice-président ou de vacance de son poste, le conseil autorise un autre dirigeant ou administrateur de la Société à exercer la vice-présidence. La durée de l'intérim est, 5 sauf prorogation approuvée par le gouverneur en conseil, limitée à soixante jours.

(1) Dans la Loi sur la Société de développement du Cap-Breton et aux articles 3 à 19 de la présente loi, la Division du développement industriel de la Société de développement du Cap-Breton est à considérer comme une société distincte — ci-après dénommée la Division — dont la continuité est assurée par la Société d'expansion du Cap-Breton constituée par l'article 3 de la présente loi et ci-après dénommée la Société. 15

Continuité

Directors and officers

(2) For the purposes of this section, the members of the Board of Directors of the continued corporation shall be deemed to have resigned immediately before the corporation was continued, and the President of the Cape Breton Development Corporation shall be deemed not to have been an officer or director of the continued corporation. 20

(2) Pour l'application du présent article, les administrateurs de la Division sont considérés comme démissionnaires dès la constitution de la Société et le président de la Société de développement du Cap-Breton est réputé ne pas avoir été administrateur ou dirigeant de la Division. 20

Administrateurs et dirigeants

By-laws

(3) The by-laws of the Cape Breton Development Corporation that are in force on the coming into force of this section shall, to the extent they are applicable, be deemed to have been the by-laws of the continued corporation but those by-laws shall cease to have effect as the by-laws of the new corporation sixty days after the coming into force of this section. 30

(3) Les règlements administratifs de la Société de développement du Cap-Breton, encore applicables à la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent article, sont réputés avoir été pris par la Division mais ils cessent d'avoir effet, comme règlements administratifs de la Société, soixante jours après cette date. 30

Règlements administratifs

Directions

(4) The President of the Treasury Board, the Minister and the Minister responsible for Cape Breton Development Corporation may, by order, give such directions as they deem necessary to give effect to the intent of this section, and any such directions have the force of law. 35 40

(4) Le ministre, le président du Conseil du Trésor et le ministre responsable de la Société de développement du Cap-Breton peuvent, par arrêté, donner les instructions qu'ils jugent nécessaires à la mise en application du présent article. Ces instructions ont force de loi. 40

Instructions

Transfer of property

(5) For greater certainty, the administration and control of all property that, on the coming into force of this section, is held by or leased to the Cape Breton Development Corporation for the use or benefit of the continued corporation are transferred to the new corporation. 45

(5) Il est entendu que la gestion et le contrôle des biens qui, lors de l'entrée en vigueur du présent article, sont détenus par la Société de développement du Cap-Breton ou loués à celle-ci, pour l'avantage ou l'usage de la Division, sont transférés à la Société. 40

Transfert de propriété

Certain provisions not to apply

(6) Section 100, 101 and 108 of the Financial Administration Act do not apply in respect of any transfer of assets, including shares, from the Cape Breton Development Corporation to the new corporation under or pursuant to this Act, and section 101 of that Act does not apply in respect of any acquisition by the new corporation of those assets.

(6) Les articles 100, 101 et 108 de la Loi sur l'administration financière ne s'appliquent pas au transfert d'actifs, y compris les actions, de la Société de développement du Cap-Breton à la Société effectué conformément à la présente loi, et l'article 101 de cette loi ne s'applique pas à l'acquisition de ces actifs par la Société.

EMERGENCIES BILL

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed, without further amendments, to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

CRIMINAL CODE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to the question of leave on these bills—and I say “these bills” because I hope the Senate will give me leave to mention that there are, in all, coming from the House of Commons today, Bill C-61, Bill C-124, Bill C-75 and Bill C-58. The Deputy Leader of the Government and I discussed the anticipated legislative program for this week and we understand—although not officially—that the House of Commons will be sending us a fair amount of legislation this week and that the house leaders in the other place are attempting to complete their work on the other side before adjournment, either this week or early next week.

That, of course, will mean the adoption in the other place of quite a lengthy and important menu of legislation, and we in the Senate will try to deal with and have ready for Royal Assent as much of that menu as it is reasonable to expect from us. However, I believe that the Deputy Leader of the Government and I are agreed that it is impossible for us to have the total program ready for Royal Assent or otherwise dealt with in such a short time. Therefore, he and I have agreed that this week we will try to abridge the time for debate to see if we can at least help the government with legislation that—famous last words!—is non-controversial.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Frith is quite correct. We did have a discussion this morning. It is our hope to move along as much of this legislation as we reasonably can. I agree that some bills are perhaps more controversial than they appeared to be at the beginning—

Senator Frith: And more meaty!

Senator Doody: —but that will evolve as we go along. Therefore, without making any major commitment on either side at this point, it is our hope to move the legislative program that we now have before us fairly quickly, and as additional legislation comes up from the other place we will look at it and judge it on its merits.

At this point I can see no reason why we cannot hope for a speedy disposition of the legislation before us, and I hope that everything else that comes up can be treated equally quickly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-124, an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OFFSHORE PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-75, to implement an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia on offshore petroleum resource management and revenue sharing and to make related and consequential amendments.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

MUTUAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN CRIMINAL MATTERS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-58, to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CHILD CARE

REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE ON CHILD CARE ENTITLED "SHARING THE RESPONSIBILITY" TABLED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the eighteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology respecting child care.

I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no problem with the report; it is just that I should like to know whether it is our standard procedure now to print all the reports in the Minutes of the Proceedings and in Hansard. My understanding is that the report will be printed and distributed to honourable senators. We had a situation a few days ago when a senator presented a report concerning a parliamentary visit and it was printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings and in Hansard. It was also distributed to each senator.

I feel that it is uneconomical and redundant for a report to be printed so many times. Perhaps we could come to an agreement to have a single printing.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I tend to agree with Senator Doody. I have watched this procedure for several years and I believe that if we print the report only once the savings will be worthwhile. Therefore, I would be prepared to amend my motion. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix only to the Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 3933.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 12, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-111, An Act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to repeal certain enactments in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, July 7, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a procedural nit. The motion should be by Senator Rossiter. I do not mean that is precisely what took place. However, according to the rules, the motion should be made by the senator sponsoring the bill.

On motion of Senator Rossiter, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan B. Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 12, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-89, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (victims of crime), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, May 18, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following comments and one recommendation.

The Committee has held hearings and has heard from a number of witnesses.

The Committee wishes to express its concerns about two elements of the Bill: the extension of the mandatory ban on publication of the identity of complainants in both extortion and loansharking offences; and the lack of a provision for appeal of an order of imprisonment in default of restitution.

In general, the Committee believes that bans on publication in criminal cases should be made by the courts on a case-by-case basis. We recognize the need for a mandatory ban in exceptional cases. This was why we agreed to the provision in relation to sexual offences against children. Even in that instance we gave the question careful consideration. A mandatory ban is a drastic curtailment of freedom of the press, and should be used sparingly. We are not convinced that extortion and loansharking are offences for which an exception should be made.

However, the Supreme Court of Canada has heard argument and will soon be announcing its decision in the Canadian Newspaper Co. Ltd. case dealing with the validity of a mandatory publication ban in light of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In view of this forthcoming decision, the Committee has decided to hold its objections in abeyance. We expect the Court to give guidance as to the extent to which the state is justified in limiting the freedom of the press.

With respect to the absence of an appeal from an order of imprisonment in default of payment of restitution, our concern is that offenders not be sent to jail without all the safeguards the criminal justice system can provide.

In response to our concerns, government officials have stated that imprisonment in default of payment of restitution is not intended to apply to offenders who cannot pay. Rather, it is an enforcement method of last resort. Although they pointed to safeguards in the Bill and advanced strong arguments to support their contention, the Committee nonetheless has continuing concerns with the lack of appeal in relation to a proceeding that may result in imprisonment for non-payment of restitution, perhaps years after the offence. The existence of other safeguards including judicial review is significant but an appeal mechanism would have been preferable.

The Committee has often expressed the view that it is essential for the government to implement systems to monitor the impact and evaluate the effectiveness of any new measures affecting the criminal justice system. The Committee regrets that in response to its questions it has again been advised that the idea is still under study.

The Committee strongly recommends that the government take immediate action, in conjunction with provincial and territorial authorities, to put in place a system of data collection that will provide statistics not only on the impact and effectiveness of the new measures contained in Bill C-89 but also on other recently created criminal offences and their corresponding sanctions.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Neiman, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, July 14, 1988, I will move:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider, after second reading, the Bill C-72, An Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada;

That, notwithstanding Rule 66(1)(b), the special committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bonnell, Cools, Côtteau, David, De Bané, Guay, Ottenheimer, Robichaud, Tremblay and Wood;

That the quorum of the special committee be four members; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

These are new net jobs by December 31, 1998. I would be grateful if the senator could let me have the answer at his earliest convenience.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make an inquiry.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers. The first is in response to a question asked by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell on June 7, 1988, regarding Transport—Prince Edward Island—Consultations on Design of Ferry—Relocation of Terminal. The second is in response to a question asked by Senator Molgat on June 7, 1988, regarding Fur Industry—Proposed British Labelling of Canadian Products—Government Action. The third is in response to a question asked on June 14, 1988, by Senator Bonnell regarding National Defence—Spraying of Poisonous Nerve Gases. And the fourth is in response to a question asked by Senator Olson on July 6, 1988, regarding Agriculture—Alberta—Drought Relief Program—Signing of Agreement.

If honourable senators agree, I ask that these answers be printed as part of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate could read the one regarding transportation and Prince Edward Island. I think all of Canada would like to know about that.

Senator Doody: I certainly would not want to keep all of Canada in suspense.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CONSULTATIONS ON DESIGN OF FERRY—RELOCATION OF TERMINAL

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to a question asked by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell on June 7, 1988, regarding Transport—Prince Edward Island—Consultations on Design of Ferry—Relocation of Terminal. The answer reads as follows:

The necessity for a new ferry and terminal redevelopment came from the Prince Edward Island-Mainland Study of the mid-1970's, updated in 1986. Both the Province of Prince Edward Island and Northumberland Ferries Limited have been fully consulted. At the present time, there is a conceptual design for the ferry, which will be developed by naval architects, to ensure stability and safety criteria are met.

Relocation of the terminals was considered but rejected, due to the very high cost of both terminal and highway construction required.

During the summer, there is a ferry at intervals of approximately 50 minutes.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government would find out if that answer means that they are not going to take the opportunity now to build that new terminal for the new double-decker ferry so that people will not have to pass through that narrow and shallow channel, so that the time taken to make that trip is shortened, and so that the people of eastern Prince Edward Island will have winter service as well as summer service, and that they will use the ferries which will be scrapped after the fixed link is constructed for use on the eastern end of the island at this new terminal and start immediately to build a new ferry at some shipyard, and not hold up this ferry construction. Can the leader find that out as well?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will certainly pass that along. My memory tells me that I just read an answer to the effect that the idea of relocating the terminal had been rejected. Nevertheless, I will pass along the honourable senator's comments for further consideration.

Senator Bonnell: Maybe we should reject the people who made that decision.

FUR INDUSTRY

PROPOSED BRITISH LABELLING OF CANADIAN PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 7, 1988, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding the Fur Industry—Proposed British Labelling of Canadian Products—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

As a matter of policy there is no linkage between the submarine procurement issue and the British fur labelling question. Each issue is considered on its own merit and action taken accordingly. However it is also true that we cannot fail to recognize the negative impact which any affirmative labelling decision could have had on Canada's native communities and others associated with fur. Indeed the threat to the native communities was undoubtedly one of the considerations taken into account by the British Government in withdrawing the regulation on June 16. We feel that the very welcome British decision was also a testimonial to the admirably coordinated efforts by the government, indigenous and other fur support groups in making known their concerns and interests.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPRAYING OF POISONOUS NERVE GASES

Hon C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 14, 1988, by the Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding National Defence—Spraying of Poisonous Nerve Gases.

(The answer follows:)

The testing of live chemical agents at the Defence Research Establishment Suffield is subject to strict safety procedures. Before a test occurs weather forecast details are sought from experts on site, and only when conditions are suitable would a test take place. Notification of a test is given to all personnel in the CFB Suffield area. A trained medical person is on site and the local Medical Inspection Facility is put on notice.

The testing of live agents is not a regular occurrence and is intended primarily for the development of protective clothing and equipment for the Canadian Forces. The test site is located at CFB Suffield and occupies an area of approximately 12 square kilometers of the 2,700 square kilometer Base and is located at least 7 kilometers from a public road.

AGRICULTURE

ALBERTA—DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAM—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on July 6, 1988, by the Hon. H.A. Olson, regarding Agriculture—Alberta—Drought Relief Program—Signing of Agreement.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Alberta, Mr. Peter Elzinga, announced on July 6, a $31.5 million contribution towards drought assistance.

The $31.5 million drought assistance program represents Alberta's contribution to the federal-provincial cost sharing initiative announced June 30 by federal Agriculture Minister John Wise.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, could that order stand in the name of Senator Murray? He has asked that he be given the right to speak on this order tomorrow.

CRIMINAL CODE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.

He said: Honourable senators, having moved second reading, I should like to explain that the purpose of this legislation is to strike at the profits generated by certain types of criminal offences. The legislation will do this by providing law enforcement agencies with the necessary powers to investigate, freeze and seize the proceeds of certain crimes and by providing the courts with the powers to confiscate the proceeds of these crimes.

It is an initiative that is both firm and fair. The need to deal appropriately with this growing problem has been tempered with the requirement to insure that the fundamental principles of due process are maintained throughout the entire forfeiture process. It is obvious that these measures are sensitive to all of the protections of our criminal justice system, including the developing principles of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

First I wish to comment on the "proceeds of crime" initiative in the international context. In relation to the growing world tragedy of drug abuse, the United Nations has recognized the need to approach the problem on a global level. It is apparent that drug traffickers ignore international borders and the reality of drug abuse will continue to flourish and grow unless all the nations of the world confront it with appropriate criminal sanctions.

In response to this, the United Nations is presently in the process of developing a draft Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances. I, for one, would expect Canada to continue to show leadership in this area by means of a firm commitment to the proposals of that Convention.

In recognition of the fundamental need to prevent and repress the acquisition and laundering of the proceeds of illicit traffic in drugs, the principal undertaking of participating nations is to adopt legislative measures to facilitate the identification, tracing, freezing, seizing and forfeiture of such proceeds. It is clear, therefore, that Canada has anticipated her commitment to the international community of nations with the presentation of this legislation.

I trust honourable senators will allow Canada to join the other members of the United Nations in this important endeavour by allowing the proceeds of crime proposal expeditious passage into law. In addition, this legislation echoes the provisions of the draft convention by authorizing the pre-trial maintenance of the status quo by allowing for court-authorized freezing and seizure of the proceeds of crime. All of these elements of the legislation are reflective of the United Nations' model.

Similar comments apply to the provisions in the bill that create the inference from an unexplained increase in net worth, so that there will be certain procedures for the appointment of managers in conjunction with restraining orders; all of this to stop the fleeing of funds once criminals know they have been detected.

I note that the many built-in protections for third parties are also a feature of the draft convention as well as of this piece of legislation. I am pleased that this bill will enable Canada to assist the United Nations in the efforts that are being made to rid the world of the tragedy flowing from the abuse of drugs by striking out at the very lifeblood of these profiteers: their financial base.

Honourable senators, the communiqué of the 1986 meeting of Commonwealth Law Ministers held in Harare, Zimbabwe, last summer calls on member states to strengthen legal provisions to enable the proceeds of crime to be identified and forfeited, especially in light of the growth of drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking. That communiqué went on to note the concern that these drug trafficking empires posed to the social fabric and security of many countries. One only has to look at the situation in Colombia, where a criminal organization such as the Medellín Cartel, through its involvement and virtual control of the North American cocaine market, is able to function freely, bringing the judiciary, the police and the democratic process to their knees by acts of terrorism and murder. Democracy cannot survive in the face of the strength of such empires based on the trafficking of drugs.

In any event, I note that this bill is consistent with the resolve that has been established in the Commonwealth of Nations to deal appropriately with the international problem of traffic in drugs. We owe this much to the developing nations of the Third World.

● (1430)

With the presentation of this legislation, Canada now joins the list of western democracies to implement a procedure for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime. The most obvious example that we can think of is the RICO or Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Statutes in the United States of America. I note that, although this Canadian proposal has the same objective in mind as the American legislation, that is, the elimination of criminal profiteering, it does so in a uniquely "Made in Canada" fashion: the proceeds of crimes—and only the proceeds of crime—will be forfeited under our legislation rather than entire interests in enterprises that may have only a minimal connection with criminal activity. In the Canadian context, the sanction of forfeiture will be proportional to the criminal involvement. Also, the proposal does not target instruments of crime, which can be an unfair application. I believe honourable senators will be impressed by the balance, as well as the firmness, of these measures.

The United Kingdom has recently passed legislation to deal with the problem of the proceeds of crime. In the drug area, the Drug Trafficking Offences Act, 1986 was proclaimed in force in January of 1987. It includes many measures that are similar to this legislation. In particular, it provides for a form of pre-trial seizure of the proceeds of crime. This element of pre-trial restraint appears to be a fundamental feature of proceeds of crime legislation in all countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom. The collective opinion is that it is necessary, like pre-trial detention, in order to make the forfeiture provisions effective.

I note, returning to the situation in England, that they have a provision that is similar, to some extent, to the proposal in our legislation—to allow for the imposition of an alternative fine as a substitute for the proceeds of crime that have been placed out of reach of the authorities. The British experience must be similar to the Canadian one to foresee the need to create this incentive in the minds of enterprise criminals to make their proceeds of crime available to the courts for forfeiture.

When we look at Australia, there are proceeds of crime forfeiture statutes in virtually all of the states and at the federal level. All of them have the same fundamental features that the Canadian proposal will have, including pre-trial restraint of the proceeds of crime. When one looks at the New South Wales legislation, one will see that it too provides for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime of an absconding offender. That feature is found in our bill as well.

In closing, I do not think that anyone would argue against the suggestion that each one of these countries that already have proceeds of crime legislation is, to use words from the opening paragraph of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a "free and democratic society." That is obvious. They have all seen fit to attempt to limit the growth of enterprise crime by confiscating its profits from the hands of the criminal.

I trust that all honourable senators will approach this legislation with the same unanimity as the members of the British Parliament did in granting speedy passage to their Drug Trafficking Offences Act, 1986. Not only would this show our maturity as a nation but it would, we hope, be noted by the criminal element that Canada treats the proceeds of crime as seriously as do other nations of the world.

Honourable senators, this bill was passed Thursday last, July 7, in the House of Commons, on division. The New Democratic Party expressed some concern, and no one from the Liberal side spoke on it. However, I should mention that the Liberal Justice critic, Mr. Kaplan, spoke on second reading, I might say endorsing the entire bill and urging quick passage of the bill. Honourable senators, I ask you to support this bill, and I trust it will, after short consideration, be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further consideration.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-124, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-124 amends Part IV of the Canada Labour Code.

Enterprises under federal jurisdiction, and to which the Canada Labour Code applies, include interprovincial or international works and undertakings such as railways, highways, transport, telephone, telegraph and cable systems, pipelines, canals, ferries, tunnels, bridges and shipping. As well, the Code applies to broadcasting, banking, air transport and some 40 crown corporations. Also included are industries declared by Parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada, such as grain elevators.

In addition, the occupational safety and health provisions of the Code apply to the federal public service, operating employees in the transportation industry and workers involved in the exploration and development of oil and gas in certain Canada lands. Therefore, over one million workers are covered by the Canada Labour Code's provisions on occupational safety and health.

The bill before us would make necessary changes to this legislation. These changes, while minor in themselves, will help make the Canada Labour Code a more flexible and efficient instrument for the protection of Canadian workers. The first of these changes is a series of amendments to Part IV of the Code, which have general application. The second relates only to the federally regulated coal mines in Cape Breton.

The objective of the proposed bill is to ensure consistency between the recently amended Part IV of the Canada Labour Code and the regulations made pursuant to the Code. One major intent of the Code amendments enacted in 1984 and proclaimed in 1986 was to clarify the prime responsibility of the employer for employees' occupational safety and health. The regulation-making authorities of the Code in this respect were therefore limited to precise standards which could be rigidly prescribed.

This approach has generally shown its merits. However, there can be a problem in some situations and environments in which some flexibility is required. The proposed amendments to the Code will address this problem by providing new or clearer authorities.

Honourable senators, I should now like to present these changes in logical order rather than clause by clause in order to explain more clearly the purpose of this bill and the thinking behind it.

First, I will deal with the amendments of general application. Clauses 4 and 5 of the bill will provide authority, pursuant to the proposed subsections 105(7), 106(1.1) and (1.2), to make regulations for circumstances or situations in which it is not possible to prescribe rigid standards.

As any experienced legislator knows, the law is an imperfect instrument, and it is sometimes impossible to make regulations, for instance, that cover every aspect of an engineering work or structure. Rather than attempting to do so through a legal text, the situation can be covered far better by a requirement that the work or structure be constructed "in accordance with good engineering practice." It is then possible for a professional engineer to certify that good engineering practice has been used. But this is not a prescribed standard, and such a requirement would not be permitted by the current authorities in the Code. The proposed amendment will permit such a requirement, but only where the Governor in Council deems it appropriate.

Authority is also required to permit regulations to be made applicable generally to all workplaces, or all classes of employment or, particularly, to one or more workplaces or one or more classes of employment, as may be specified in these regulations. To ensure that employees enjoy the protection offered by the most recent updated standards, authority is required to reference standards as amended from time to time. Authority is also required for use of the words "to the extent that it is practicable or reasonably practicable". This would cover situations where it would be unreasonable to prescribe one precise standard for all situations.

For instance, we cannot reasonably expect that buildings built before 1985 would meet all the requirements of the 1985 building code. A more appropriate regulation would require that all buildings will comply with the most recent building code to the extent that it is reasonably practicable.

Regarding clause 2 of the bill, the proposed amendment would authorize the provision in the regulations that requires an annual report on each safety and health committee's activities to be made in the prescribed form to a person designated by the regulation. This would permit Labour Canada to know whether the safety and health committees were performing their prescribed functions effectively or whether they might need assistance. Also, it would cut down on the paperwork that would be required if minutes were to be submitted constantly to Labour Canada.

I will now address the proposed amendments that refer only to federally-regulated coal mining in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. Because of the special risks involved in working in the Cape Breton Development Corporation's coal mines in Nova Scotia, it is proposed to establish—in addition to the health and safety committees—a tripartite coal mining safety commission with the authority to review and approve plans, procedures, methods and equipment in order to ensure that there will be safety in the ever-changing mining environment.

[Senator Spivak]

In keeping with the goal of Bill C-124 of providing greater flexibility in the application of occupational safety and health regulations, the commission will also have the authority to vary, or exempt from, the application of regulations, or to substitute a different standard, where such actions will provide equal or better safety protection for the coal miners.

In reference to clause 3 of the bill, I note that the manner of establishment, selection and remuneration of commission members, as well as the powers and duties of the commission, are set out in the proposed sections 94.1 and 94.2 of the Code.

Referring to clause 1 of the bill, honourable senators will note that the proposed section 82.3 requires that the employer, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, shall comply with the conditions and provisions imposed by the commission under the authority of section 94.1.

In addition, it is proposed that, pursuant to section 82.3, the Code would provide authority for two long-standing practices: the first is the practice of permitting persons selected by the coal mining employees to inspect all workplaces in a mine to ensure that they are safe in all respects—that is, worker-inspectors. The second practice is that of searching persons going underground to ensure that none carry cigarettes, lighters, alcohol or drugs into the hazardous and potentially explosive mine atmosphere.

Finally, clause 6 of the bill proposes that, in order to ensure continuity of safe operation of the coal mines, pre-existing exemptions and approvals issued in the interests of safety remain in force. In other words, this is a transition clause.

Also, clause 7 of the bill proposes that the sections of this act to amend the Canada Labour Code would come into force at different times, particularly to permit time for the establishment of the coal mining safety commission and to avoid having to make certain provisions of the regulations again under the amended act.

As I mentioned earlier, honourable senators, these changes, though minor, are an important step in making the Canada Labour Code a more flexible and efficient instrument for the protection of Canadian workers.

Honourable senators, this bill was brought into the House of Commons through extensive consultation among all parties and it is my belief that it was supported by all political parties in the House of Commons. Therefore, I urge you to grant this bill expeditious passage.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OFFSHORE PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ethel Cochrane moved the second reading of Bill C-75, to implement an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia on offshore petroleum resource management and revenue sharing and to make related and consequential amendments.

She said: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I introduce to the Senate for second reading Bill C-75, to implement the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Senator Cochrane continues, I wonder if she can tell us just what the situation is with respect to copies of this bill. We have one copy marked "Reprinted as amended and reported June 8, 1988, by a legislative committee." I have another copy that Senator Cochrane was kind enough to give me that is marked "As passed by the House of Commons July 7, 1988."

Senator Cochrane: Honourable senators, I think Mr. Greene, the Clerk Assistant of the Senate, is about to provide us with the latest copy of this bill.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think that copies of the amendments to this bill are available to honourable senators and will be distributed shortly. However, I do not think we have printed copies of the bill as amended—the Clerk Assistant is nodding his head to me and saying that they are now available, so they will be distributed to honourable senators as quickly as possible.

Senator Frith: Which version will we then be referring to?

Senator Cochrane: Senator Frith, I have the copy dated July 7, 1988.

Senator Frith: That is the one to which you will be referring?

Senator Cochrane: Yes.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Cochrane: The Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord was signed on August 26, 1986, by the Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, and by the Premier of Nova Scotia, John Buchanan. The accord replaces and improves on the 1982 offshore agreement with Nova Scotia by bringing the province into full and equal partnership with the Government of Canada in the sharing of decision-making and benefits from offshore oil and gas resources.

Lying at the heart of the legislation is a new shared-management regime under which the province has an equal say in decisions affecting its offshore resources. This will significantly improve on the arrangements contained in the 1982 agreement with Nova Scotia, pursuant to which the province had only an advisory role in a federally controlled system.

The legislation will create a new, independent board to administer and regulate petroleum activities in the offshore on behalf of the two governments. The board will have considerable autonomy on technical decisions, but will be subject to the joint direction of the two governments on any fundamental decisions. The creation of this new board will be consistent with the government's overall approach to the management of eastern Canada's offshore resources. It builds on the foundation of the frontier energy policy announced in 1985 and upon the Atlantic Accord.

At this time I should like to explain briefly how the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Board will operate. The mandate of the board will be to make decisions on matters directly affecting the management of offshore petroleum resources. The offices and personnel of the board will be in Nova Scotia and it will perform the functions previously performed by the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration with regard to all operations offshore Nova Scotia.

This new board will be composed of five members, including a chairman appointed by both governments. Each government will appoint two members to the board and may appoint alternative members to act in the absence or incapacity of any of the regular members. No more than two members of the board will be public servants.

The board will generally make all decisions relating to the management of offshore petroleum resources. The board will regulate the technical aspects of petroleum exploration, development and production on behalf of both governments and will have the final say on such technical matters. Decisions of the board that are considered fundamental will be subject to veto by the two governments. Examples of fundamental decisions are the issuing of calls for bids, the approval of development plans and the approval of benefits plans.

Honourable senators, the legislation will convert into a grant the $200 million offshore development fund created under the 1982 agreement. Above and beyond this, the Government of Canada will make available to Nova Scotia Resources (Ventures) Limited a new $25 million fund to assist it in participating in exploration and development drilling in the offshore area.

Another aspect of this legislation is that it incorporates existing federal legislation, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act and the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act so that there will be consistency in the legal framework for oil and gas activity in all offshore areas of Canada. This is highly desirable from both an industry and government perspective in ensuring that consistently safe and well-understood practices apply in all coastal areas.

The board will also be subject to the joint direction of the two governments on fundamental decisions, the holding of public reviews and the carrying out of special studies. The bill provides for memoranda of understanding to be entered into between the board and federal and provincial departments to coordinate and facilitate regulatory practices in the offshore. The board will be the instrument by which joint management is achieved in the offshore. It will operate in the spirit of the accord, which is to create an offshore management régime under which the province has a full and equal say in decisions.

Honourable senators, this bill will bring much needed stability to the management of offshore resources by harmonizing federal and provincial interests within a framework that will benefit all of Canada, and Nova Scotia in particular. It will create the kind of stable investment climate essential to foster industry activity and jobs. It allocates full control of offshore revenues and fiscal instruments to the province as if these resources were on land. It is built on the principles of equity and parity that prevail under the Atlantic Accord and in other producing provinces.

The bill we are considering today reaffirms the equality of the two levels of government in the management of offshore resources and thereby bears witness to the harmonious approach this government has taken in its dealings with the provinces.

Honourable senators, a speech on second reading of Bill C-75 would not be complete without mentioning the harmonious approach that this government and the Government of Nova Scotia applied in resolving the Georges Bank issue. It clearly illustrates that joint management can and does work. As you may know, amendments to the bill with respect to Georges Bank were introduced in the House of Commons on July 7.

The people of Nova Scotia, those who stood to be most affected by any drilling activity on the Georges Bank, voiced strong concerns over the potential impacts on their precious fisheries resource. Both governments were aware of the environmental sensitivity of the Bank. Its unusual and well-documented combination of tides, currents and topography combine to create a unique habitat in which high concentrations of scallops and groundfish thrive.

Recognizing the need to ensure full protection of the Georges Bank fishery and taking into account the serious concerns being voiced over the potential impact of drilling in this area, the Governments of Canada and Nova Scotia reached agreement on measures designed to ensure a full and open public review of the question: first, a moratorium would be put in place on oil and gas activity on Georges Bank until at least the year 2000. Second, prior to 1996 an independent review panel would be formed to hold public hearings on the environmental and social impacts of drilling on the Bank. That panel is to report to the federal and provincial Ministers of Energy on or before July 1, 1999. Both ministers will then jointly decide whether the ban on petroleum activity should be extended beyond January 1, 2000.

Honourable senators, these amendments have received wide public support and the manner in which they were agreed on with the province is witness to the spirit of cooperation and the willingness of governments to work together that lies at the heart of Bill C-75.

In conclusion, the legislation to implement the Nova Scotia Accord will ensure that the Government of Nova Scotia takes its rightful place alongside the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador as an equal partner with the Government of Canada in the management of petroleum resources off the east coast. Bill C-75 will set aside the question of which level of government has jurisdiction over the offshore resources in favour of a joint management régime under which these resources will be managed for the benefit of all Canadians and in particular Nova Scotians.

[Senator Cochrane.]

The passage of this bill will mark another milestone in the history of federal-provincial relations. The era of confrontation with the provinces is truly over. It is only through cooperation and consensus that we can achieve harmony and unity, and Bill C-75 is a testimony to this truth.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

MUTUAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN CRIMINAL MATTERS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer moved the second reading of Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976.

He said: Honourable senators, no one would think of denying that cooperation is essential to the life of the international community.

Investigation and punishment of crimes are essential activities of government. The legislative branch creates offences, which the executive has the responsibility to punish. But this activity is pursued only on the national territory, because outside its boundaries, the state does not exist and can only perform these duties to the extent that the foreign government consents.

This consent, which is essential for international cooperation, is given in a more or less formal agreement expressed in a treaty or tacitly, out of the need for mutual assistance and respect.

[English]

I have notes that go on in interesting detail pointing out the growing importance today of the whole area of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters. I think in general honourable senators would agree with the points made therein. It is pointed out that in recent years we have made great advances in technology and communications, transportation and the transfer of money from country to country, or jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and also, of course, in the great mobility of people. All these aspects, which in abbreviation could be called "technology and mobility", require that within the international legal context there be a realistic system of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters.

[Translation]

With this bill, the government publicly emphasizes its commitment to dealing with the increase in transnational crime. The bill arises from the present government's intense activity in this respect, which led to the plan for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters adopted by the Commonwealth at the Harare Conference in July 1986 and the signing of a treaty for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters with the United States on March 18, 1985.

We must see this bill within the context of what is generally understood by mutual legal assistance. For police investigations, there is a form of mutual assistance that is non-compulsory and does not require the strict framework of a treaty or enabling legislation. I am referring to the kind of informal cooperation that exists among police forces the world over.

In certain cases, however, it would not be possible to obtain the information requested because the individuals who possess the information refuse to communicate it unless legally forced to do so.

Mutual legal assistance in criminal matters sometimes uses voluntary means, while in other circumstances, such assistance can be obtained only through the use of compulsory means. The fact is that today, there is nothing in our statutes that authorizes the exercise of mutual legal assistance by compulsory means, with the exception of the limited scope of a rogatory commission.

● (1500)

[English]

Canada has decided to base its system of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters on a regime of bilateral treaties. It is felt that such negotiated bilateral treaties will give the flexibility to protect Canada's interests and to recognize the legitimate interests of the other partners—the other signatories to the treaties.

Also, of course, the criminal law in Canada is, essentially, founded on the common law tradition, and Canada will be entering into treaties with jurisdictions based on the Roman civil law. It is felt that the mechanism of the negotiated bilateral treaty will give the flexibility to best accommodate this—what, for want of a better term, I will call—“duality”.

[Translation]

This bill provides the measure of assistance we consider we can legitimately offer our partners. Under the authority of the Minister of Justice, mutual legal assistance concentrates on four areas: search warrants, evidence-gathering for foreign countries, the transfer of persons in custody and finally, the lending of exhibits. It would be difficult to imagine any other form of mutual assistance that would be effective while at the same time respecting the sovereignty of states.

The definitions proposed in Clause 2 substantially repeat those contained in the Canada-U.S. treaty on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters, and identify a judge of the Superior Court of a province or territory as the person competent to order the use of a compulsory measure. In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this bill and the provisions of other federal legislation except for provisions prohibiting disclosure of information, the provisions of this legislation prevail. The bill provides for adding to a schedule the names of foreign states that have signed a treaty for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters with Canada and orders the publication of such treaties in the Canada Gazette. A treaty once published shall be judicially noticed.

The bill also allows foreign states to apply to Canadian courts to enforce payment of fines imposed in criminal matters in those countries.

[English]

Clauses 10 to 16 of Bill C-58 provide that a search warrant can be obtained in Canada to gather information or evidence for a foreign investigation. Once the request has been accepted by the Minister of Justice, several conditions must be met before the search warrant is issued.

The application must be made to a Canadian judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction, and not to a justice of the peace, as is the case for regular search warrants under the Criminal Code. The judge must be satisfied that an offence within the meaning of the applicable treaty has been committed; that the foreign state has jurisdiction over that offence; and that it is believed that evidence of the commission of that offence will be found in the province. Because of its special nature, the search warrant issued under the proposed legislation is considered to be a means of last resort for providing the assistance requested. Therefore, before a search warrant is issued, the judge must be satisfied that the evidence or information being sought cannot be obtained as efficiently by an evidence-gathering order, which constitutes a less intrusive means.

Finally, the search warrant must be issued to a peace officer whose name must be specified in the warrant. The judge also has discretion to submit the execution of the search warrant to specific conditions, such as the manner in which it must be executed and so on.

[Translation]

Clauses 17 to 23 authorize the judge to summon persons to testify or to produce documents or things. As in the case of a search warrant, the judge may impose the conditions for the entire proceedings, including the manner in which a refusal by a witness to answer questions is to be dealt with, where such refusal is based on the law enforced in Canada or abroad.

[English]

Clauses 24 to 29 introduce a new measure into Canadian law, namely, the transfer of detained persons for the purpose of providing assistance to a foreign country. The proposed legislation provides for the temporary transfer abroad of a person serving a term of imprisonment in Canada for the purpose of assisting the requesting state or to testify in a criminal proceeding abroad. Such a transfer is always subject to the detained person's consent. Before a judge could order the transfer, the judge would first have to be satisfied that the person in question had not only consented to go abroad but had consented freely.

[Translation]

Clauses 30 to 34 provide for the lending to a foreign state of exhibits that have been admitted in evidence in criminal proceedings in Canada in respect of an offence as defined in the applicable treaty.

The purpose of all these provisions is, of course, to act on requests by a foreign state made in accordance with the provisions of a treaty for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters. When Canada is the requesting state, the application of the Criminal Code is made more flexible by the bill so as to avoid any prejudice to the Canadian request.

The bill provides that the Minister of Justice shall authorize the transfer to Canada, for a period of time specified by the minister, of a person detained in a foreign state. A transfer would be necessary, for instance, if the prisoner's deposition were required in criminal proceedings or a criminal investigation in Canada. It would be impossible to keep this person in Canada under a foreign order of detention. However, the bill provides that a Canadian judge may make an order for the detention of that person for the duration of his stay in this country, and of course the bill provides for paramountcy of the judge's order. Thus we have the assurance that the transferred individual will be returned to the foreign state.

Finally, the bill provides for consequential amendments, one of which would have the effect of authorizing disclosure, to a foreign police force or prosecutor, of private communications which have been intercepted in Canada, if such disclosure is intended to be in the best interests of the administration of justice.

● (1510)

[English]

Honourable senators, that is the general outline of the purpose and, indeed, the clauses of Bill C-58, which I am sure honourable senators will look forward to mulling over in committee.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—MOTION TO TRANSMIT COPY OF SENATE RESOLUTION TO LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES AND FOUR NATIONAL ABORIGINAL ORGANIZATIONS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C.:

That the Honourable the Speaker do transmit to the Legislative Assembly of each province a copy of the Resolution to amend the Constitution of Canada, adopted by the Senate on 21st April, 1988, and urge that the provinces do likewise; and

That a copy of the said Resolution be transmitted by the Honourable the Speaker to the Legislative Assemblies of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories and to the four National Organizations representing the aboriginal peoples of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no intention of taking a great deal of time in addressing this motion of Senator Watt's. I simply want to say that the reasons given during the debate on the accord by this side of the house in opposition to the point set forth by Senator Watt are still valid. We are not in a position to support the resolution. The House of Commons has adopted the accord as is and it has been endorsed by most of the provinces at this point. We see no reason why we should endorse this particular motion at this time.

Therefore, with those few comments, honourable senators, I leave it to the house to dispose of it as it will.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to address a few remarks to Senator Watt's motion, perhaps on somewhat legalistic points. I would remind honourable senators that Senator Watt spoke to this motion on June 15. In his remarks he raised a fundamental matter of constitutional law. Not only is it of particular concern to our parliamentary institutions but it is also of concern to all the people of Canada because of its long-term implications.

What we must remember is that in this matter we are moving in an unprecedented area. By our actions we are setting precedents that might affect the constitutional practices of this country for years to come. For that reason we must proceed with greatest caution and premeditation.

Our first problem is to determine what procedural matters we must consider when dealing with the Constitution and what matters are, in fact, matters of substance. I have only to remind honourable senators of an old adage that comes from the common law of many years ago, that the substance of the law is bound up in the interstices of procedure. So, as we proceed in these matters, we must take great care with regard to the procedures we adopt, because they will ultimately affect many very important matters of substance.

May I now remind honourable senators of the points that Senator Watt brought out in his speech last June?

First he said that the Senate's role in the constitutional amendment process is not the same as that with respect to legislation. I could not agree with that statement more heartily.

I am afraid that we have been dealing with this major constitutional initiative called the Meech Lake Accord as though it had been a bill coming from the other place that we had amended. That, honourable senators, is far from the truth. In fact, what we did here on April 21 was to pass a resolution under Part V of the Constitution Act of 1982. Under that part there are only two sections under which we could have been proceeding: either section 46 or section 47. I would like to turn back to that point in a moment.

In his remarks last month Senator Watt pointed out that, when it approved a resolution authorizing a modified version of the Meech Lake Accord, the Senate did something far more important than simply to reject the resolution that had been transmitted to us from the House of Commons. He maintained—and I submit he may very well have been correct; and I will get back to this matter in a few moments—that, when we passed the resolution in its final form in this chamber, we initiated a procedure for an entirely new set of constitutional amendments. In other words, there may very well now be two sets of constitutional amendments before the country: first, that resolution arising from the Meech Lake Accord, which was passed in the House of Commons initially—I say initially; and, second, that constitutional amendment contained in the Resolution passed by the Senate on April 21 of this year.

May I now revert to Senator Watt's point and extrapolate somewhat on that? I think that what everybody in this house can agree upon is that on April 21 the Senate passed a resolution under Part V of the Constitution Act of 1982. Certainly, we did that. As I mentioned previously, that resolution could only have been passed under either section 46 or section 47. Nobody that I know of in this chamber or, I am sure, in any court has spoken to the point about which section we are proceeding under. I think it becomes self-evident how important it is for us to examine what we are doing. If we are not careful, we will be setting some very faulty precedents that could have long-term effects.

• (1520)

Let us first assume—and I emphasize that this is an assumption—that the Resolution we passed was passed under section 47 of the Constitution Act, 1982. I do not wish to bore honourable senators by reciting that section, but I think I must do so to refresh our memories. That section states:

47.(1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

If one looks to the French concomitant section, one will see that it refers to “de résolution” and “une nouvelle résolution dans le même sens”.

Did we, in fact, pass a resolution “dans le même sens” in this chamber, or did we pass “such” a resolution, “such” being somewhat like the one passed by the House of Commons? Without labouring that point, one can see how the legalities may flow from the situation we have created. If it were so passed—that is, our resolution—under section 47, and it was “such” a resolution “dans le même sens”, then the suspensive veto of the Senate is still in force and the subsequent resolution passed by the House of Commons may be absolutely meaningless—in legalese: a brutum fulmen.

I do not think I need to labour how important these considerations are to us. Let me refer again to Senator Watt's remarks. I presume, and I only presume, that Senator Watt's position is that the Senate has passed a resolution under section 46, and again, if I may be indulged by honourable senators, I would like to refresh our memories with respect to that section. It states:

46.(1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41, 42 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

In other words, if my presumption is right, namely, that Senator Watt's position is that we passed in this chamber a resolution under section 46, then we have initiated another constitutional amendment. If that is the case, then Senator Watt's motion is very pertinent, because it becomes incumbent upon us to transmit that advice, not now to the House of Commons, as we have already done so, but to the legislative bodies of each of the provinces.

I am not too certain myself with regard to the second part of Senator Watt's motion, which states:

That a copy of the said Resolution be transmitted by the Honourable the Speaker to the Legislative Assemblies of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories and to the four National Organizations representing the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

I can certainly sympathize with the reasons for including that paragraph. In fact, I would like to see that paragraph included, but there is no such provision under the Constitution Act, 1982 to do so. This makes it possible that the main thrust of Senator Watt's motion, and its vital importance to the constitutional process, might be lost because of the appending of that second paragraph. I would hope that Senator Watt might consider deleting that second paragraph and then introducing it as a separate motion. Then I think we could not be faulted on any constitutional grounds for referring the resolution we passed to the legislative assemblies of the provinces. In effect, if Senator Watt would take that paragraph out and introduce it as a separate motion, we could all support that, but I would not like to see—

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Lang: Well, those of us who are like-minded. I would not like to see its inclusion cause Senator Watt's motion to be jeopardized constitutionally in this chamber.

Subject to that one clarification, and because of the importance of the area in which we now find ourselves, the constitutional importance of the matter—and I am certain that sooner or later these issues will come right through our legal system to the Supreme Court of Canada with dear knows what results—I urge all honourable senators to support, first, Senator Watt's motion as unamended, and then, hopefully, as Senator Watt might agree, the two separate motions, the second being the second paragraph of the original motion.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, would the Honourable Senator Lang permit a question?

Senator Lang: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: When Senator Lang referred to section 47, he said that there was some doubt in his mind as to whether or not the Senate, indeed, had lost its full veto, depending on one's interpretation of section 47. What course of action does he suggest should be taken to clarify this matter?

Senator Lang: I think the next step on the road is to send a copy of the same to the legislative assemblies of the provinces; otherwise we will have to have a constitutional amendment, because the wording of section 47 is so obtuse that I think it could be litigated on for hundreds of years. But as to rectifying the situation that we find ourselves in now, I doubt that we can do anything more now. I think somebody has to challenge whether the House of Commons, in passing that resolution the second time, was in fact just creating a nullity.

Senator Frith: A dud shell.

● (1530)

Hon. Jean Bazin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Lang.

Senator Lang, I was not sure of what you meant in your argument on the distinction between the French and English texts of Article 47: "la résolution dans le même sens" or "such a resolution". Were you making the point that there was a difference between the French and the English text or were you using those two sets of words interchangeably?

Senator Lang: I am no linguistic expert, I can assure you, but, in my ignorance, I would think that they have quite a different connotation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It helps give you one interpretation of Article 47 of the English.

Senator Lang: If you look at the French text, it seems to me far more explicit, and it strengthens an argument that, in fact, the Senate has not lost its suspensive veto.

Senator Frith: In this case.

Senator Lang: In this case. In the English section the word is "such", and I think "dans le même sens" is a far more accurate expression than the word "such". I looked in the Oxford English Dictionary for the word "such" and it has a variety of meanings that are quite divergent, and I think that the French text is far more accurate in expressing the sense of the section.

In the English section the word "the" is used: "the issue", "the issue of the proclamation"; whereas the French text says: "adopté de résolution". Again, the use of the word "de" is consistent with "le même sens"; whereas in the English section the use of the word "the" is more or less inconsistent with the use of the word "such". I hope that made some sense to you, "dans le même sens".

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED
On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, The Honourable Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the committee is now in session. At the last meeting of the steering committee it was agreed that the report to the Committee of the Whole would be a factual analysis of evidence received by the committee and that it would identify the main objections. It was agreed that the report would not contain recommendations or conclusions and that no concurrence would be asked for.

Following on that instruction, the staff have prepared a document, which I am now tabling as the report of the committee. It contains what I believe to be an accurate reflection of what the committee heard in Committee of the Whole. In addition to that, we have added as Appendix I the exact draft wording of the Meech Lake Accord, and as Appendix II the wording of the Langevin Accord so that in the one text those two documents are available, because they are frequently referred to.

In addition, we have added as Appendix III the Task Force Report on the North, because it was never tabled here as part of the documents or appended to the Debates of the Senate. This, then, is the report to the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the chairman table the report in the Senate and that the committee rise, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by Honourable Senator Frith that the report—

Senator Doody: Repeat it again?

Senator Frith: That the chairman table the report in the Senate, in effect reporting it from this committee, and that the committee rise, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

Senator Doody: You do want to sit again?

Senator Frith: Perhaps not. What do you think? If the chairman does not think that we need to, then I suppose we do not need to.

Senator Doody: We are finished.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, do you have any further business for the committee?

The Chairman: There is no immediate business that I know of before the committee. The situation, however, is that there are two provinces that have not yet signed the accord, and it is a possibility that the Committee of the Whole might want to agree to meet again. I do not know.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, you meant there are two provincial legislative assemblies, not governments.

The Chairman: That is correct, two provincial legislative assemblies, to be precise.

Senator Flynn: Yes. The two governments have signed.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, that point is well taken. Between reconstituting the committee and letting it stand while we await the completion of the amending process, it might be better to rise and report progress and let the committee exist until there is some business. If and when the process is completed, we could then wind up the committee.

Senator Doody: That is fine.

The Chairman: The motion will be that the committee rise and table the third report in the Senate. Following on the discussion earlier today, I suggest that it be printed in today's Debates and not in the Minutes of the Proceedings, so that it will only appear in the Debates. Then the committee will ask for leave to sit again. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, that was the subject of my intervention earlier today on another report. The report has been printed and distributed. Do we need to print it again in Hansard? Maybe we should not discuss that here. Maybe we should discuss it in the Internal Economy Committee later on. The report has been printed and is now being distributed as a document on its own. Is it necessary that it be printed in Hansard, or should a notation in Hansard indicate that it is available?

Senator Frith: Do you mean either in the Senate Debates or in the Minutes?

Senator Doody: That it be noted in both that the document has been tabled and is available for people who want it. It is not necessary to print thousands of copies.

Senator Frith: That is a good idea.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I suggest that, if the document is not to be printed in both the Debates and the Proceedings, it should be printed in the Proceedings so that it will enter into the Journals of the Senate and thus be part of the official record of this house. I am not concerned that it be printed in both places, but it ought to be part of the official records of the house. The Debates are not the official record of this house; the Proceedings and the Journals are. That is where it should appear.

Senator Frith: I am content with that. That is what we did with the other one.

The Chairman: You are suggesting that it not be printed in the Debates but that it be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate so it then becomes a permanent record. Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: The committee will rise.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, has directed me to table the third report of the committee and ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. The committee reports progress and requests leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): At the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by Honourable Senator Flynn, that the committee have leave to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CHILD CARE

NATIONAL POLICY—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak calling the attention of the Senate to the question of a national policy on child care.—(Honourable Senator Spivak)

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I should like to have this item withdrawn since there is now another item on the same subject.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the order be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-72 WITHDRAWN

On motion of the Honourable Senator Wood:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Bill C-72, An Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto:

That the Bill be referred to the said special committee, in due course;

That, notwithstanding Rule 66(1)(b), the special committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bonnell, Cools, Cottreau, David, De Bané, Guay, Ottenheimer, Robichaud, Tremblay and Wood;

That the quorum of the special committee be four members; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, because of the notice of motion that Senator Wood gave today relating to the establishment of a special committee, which also included the proposal for pre-study, on behalf of Senator Wood I ask leave to withdraw this motion.

Senator Wood will be replacing this motion with another motion that she will speak to on Thursday.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this motion be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FOREWORD

The Subcommittee on Child Care was formed in March 1988 to study the federal government's child care initiative, which had been announced the previous December. For the first time a concerted federal/ provincial effort to create a national child care system was in process, and the Subcommittee wished to examine the federal government's proposals.

The aim of the Subcommittee's study was to obtain information. Federal/provincial negotiations had begun. The process would end in federal legislation designed to implement the arrangements which had been reached. The Subcommittee embarked on its study in order to be able to comment on the legislation responsibly, with a good background knowledge of the issues involved.

The Subcommittee was interested in learning how the federal proposals could affect provincial child care programs. This approach is consistent with the Senate's responsibility to represent the interests of the various regions of Canada.

A great deal of material about the provincial programs is publicly available. This was reviewed by the Subcommittee's researchers. As well the study led to a detailed examination of the day care subsidy under the Canada Assistance Plan, the funding arrangement under which the federal government participates in provincial child care programs.

However, the principal interest of the Subcommittee was to learn how those involved with child care services on a day-to-day basis responded to the federal proposals. We wished to interview people who could explain how the provincial programs actually work and what options provincial governments were likely to be considering in light of the federal proposals, and who could assess the proposals on the basis of their knowledge of the child care system. Many of the Subcommittee's witnesses had been involved in child care for many years, as researchers, caregivers and parents. Many were advocates for a national system of quality services. We also heard from parents who do not use child care services.

The Subcommittee did not travel, and was therefore not able to hear testimony from all provinces and territories. As a result some interviews were conducted by telephone.

This Report is both a reflection of what the Subcommittee learned, and a response. It is designed as a background paper to forthcoming federal child care legislation.

CHAPTER I

Child Care Services: The Present System

It is very interesting for me to hear from someone from Alberta and someone from Newfoundland because it is all different, and yet it is all the same. (Canada, Senate, The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, Proceedings of the Subcommittee on Child Care, April 12, 1988, 2:27, hereafter referred to as Proceedings)

The provinces and territories are at different stages in the process of developing child care policies. Parents' needs may differ in important ways from province to province, which also affects the development of services. Provincial child care programs resemble each other, however, in what they lack. In this section we do not give a detailed account of child care programs across Canada. Rather, our intention is to give a sense of the system or systems that the federal proposal is trying to affect, and also to suggest how rudimentary the system really is.

A. Provincial Policies

Over the last decade or so three provinces have tried to influence the development of child care services in a significant way. Since 1982 the government of Manitoba has made a sustained attempt to create a system of affordable services administered and operated on a non-profit basis. To this end it has introduced operating grants to eligible services, and has placed a ceiling on the fees which they charge. The grants are designed to stabilize fees while meeting the costs of a quality service. The fee ceiling is intended to prevent the segregation of services on the basis of parents' income. In 1986 Manitoba introduced measures to increase the salaries of child care workers and encourage them to pursue training. There is a Child Day Care Office, which is responsible for developing program standards and for planning. In addition a special staff of coordinators monitors standards, refers parents to services, and provides public information.

In 1979 the government of Quebec passed legislation designed to develop a range of services, including day care centres, family home day care (services provided in the caregiver's home), services in schools (after-school care), nursery schools and occasional services (which could be used by mothers who are not in the labour force). A separate agency, which reported to the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women, was set up to administer the program.

The government has in fact directed its funding to developing centre spaces and, to a lesser extent, family home spaces. It provides various kinds of capital and start-up grants to centres as well as grants to cover rent payments. There are also grants for operating costs (other than rent). Funding for day care homes is directed to agencies which administer the services. More recently the government has turned its attention to increasing infant spaces in child care centres, and has introduced additional funding for that purpose.

Quebec is interested in parent-controlled services, and until very recently gave grants only to non-profit services with parent boards. (The province will now fund services run by a joint parent/ community board.) The province has, however, been willing to give fee subsidies to parents who use for-profit services. According to our witness from Quebec, the number of these services has increased in the last few years.

In 1987 an advisory council reviewed the province's child care policy at the government's request. In its report the council recommended a number of significant changes (Gouvernement du Québec, Rapport du Comité consultatif sur les services de garde à l'enfance, le 29 juin 1987). The government has yet to respond to the report.

Between the late 60's and 70's Alberta's municipalities were the principal initiators of day care services and standards. Although some services were operated by the municipalities themselves, most were run by non-profit community boards. Between 1978 and 1980 the provincial government assumed responsibility for services for preschool children. The government introduced province-wide standards. A second initiative was to encourage the growth of services by introducing operating allowances, which were intended to help services meet the standards. The program is still in existence. In contrast to the other two provinces, operating allowances were made available to for-profit operators. The number of spaces did increase significantly, with the expansion being led by the for-profit sector. This policy has not changed significantly since 1980.

Interestingly, municipalities continue to assume responsibility for school-age child care, and they are attempting to do so in a concerted way. At least 18 municipalities are actively involved in developing services. There is an Inter-Municipal Task Force which is designed, among other things, to develop minimum standards; promote and encourage the development of training programs for caregivers at the community college level; and encourage the use of community facilities for school-age programs.

These three provinces have pursued their programs somewhat independently of the federal government's own initiatives with respect to child care. As we explain in Chapter II and Appendix I, the current federal/provincial fiscal arrangements relating to child care services do not support the effort to extend services to parents of all income levels, or to improve the quality of services by raising the salaries of caregivers, through the mechanism of a direct grant. Neither do the arrangements allow the federal government to share any of the expenditures made in respect of for-profit services in Quebec and Alberta.

The new federal proposal is more flexible. In future all these expenditures would be shareable. The increased flexibility would help the provinces pursue their different goals, but it would also raise the cost for the federal government. This caused our witness from Quebec to wonder how far that province would be allowed to expand its program:

With respect to sharing operating costs, with respect to financial assistance, I don't think Quebec stands to gain a great deal from the new federal policy. On the contrary, it may even lose. In any case, the expenditures will hit a ceiling in seven years. If ever we provide as many child care services as we expect to provide, and a great many families need financial help and are entitled to financial help, this means Quebec won't have the right to all this money. (Proceedings, May 3, 1988, 4:15)

More recently, the Yukon, Prince Edward Island and Ontario have undertaken important initiatives. Since 1985 the government of the Yukon has dramatically increased expenditures for services. The government has improved standards, especially with respect to infant care. It has tried to increase spaces by introducing some funds for capital development, and has also introduced operating grants. As well, it has increased fee subsidies. The program is administered through a day care coordinator. An independent board is responsible for maintaining standards. While we were holding our hearings the government began a series of public consultations which would be the basis of a more directed policy.

In 1986 Prince Edward Island indicated the direction it wished to follow in developing services. Since then, it has concentrated on three aspects of its policy: the quality and availability of services, areas where it has implemented new initiatives, and fee subsidies to low-income parents. The province has introduced new training standards, and direct funding to increase salaries for child care workers. It gives a small grant to the Early Childhood Development Association to maintain materials which can be loaned to licensed centres. The province sponsors seminars and workshops on early childhood education to provide opportunities for professional development. It also subsidizes course fees for early childhood education in certain circumstances. In recognition of the need for infants to be cared for in small groups, the government has introduced an Infant Incentive Grant for licensed day care homes which meet established criteria.

It seems clear that the governments of the Yukon and P.E.I. would not have embarked on their initiatives without the expectation of increased federal support. The government of P.E.I. expressly acknowledged the importance of a new federal program in the document which set out its guidelines for developing child care services:

While Government support for licensed child care services is on-going, the Direct Funding program for licensed facilities and the Infant Incentive Grant, as described in this document, will only be available during the present fiscal year, ending in March, 1988. In early 1988, the Provincial Government will undertake an analysis of upcoming Federal initiatives for child care. This analysis, combined with an evaluation of the 1987-88 direct funding program, will help determine the nature of Government funding for licensed child care facilities for fiscal year 1988-89, as well as future years. (P.E.I. Department of Health and Social Services, Guiding Principles for the Development of Child Care Services, September 1987, p. 20)

Ontario has designed a comprehensive child care policy in anticipation of the new federal program. The province intends to increase services through the non-profit sector, improve existing services and expand the financing of fee subsidies to parents. The government has set some short-term priorities: higher salaries for caregivers, and more subsidies for parents with infants and handicapped children. New initiatives include direct funding to services through capital and operating grants. Existing for-profit services will be eligible for funding, though new services will not.

The province recognizes the need for planning. It has set up a new Day Care Branch, which is responsible for developing policy, designing new models of service, determining the need for funds and evaluating the program. The province intends to implement its policies through a series of three-year plans.

What are the implications of the new federal child care initiative for Ontario? Our witness gave this question a lengthy response:

I have been attempting to make assumptions as to what Ontario's expenditures might be in the future with respect to child care. During my research in this respect, I have talked to many people who are involved in research with respect to child care or who are child care advocates. In fact, the province has commissioned a great deal of research on various aspects of child care. The consensus of opinion I have gathered from these people is that most people in Ontario are extremely concerned about the federal strategy for reasons quite different from those expressed by people from other provinces. In my opinion, the Ontario government has actually gone out on a limb to lay out what they want to do and, in a sense, the federal strategy is perfectly tailored to allow Ontario to do exactly what it wants to do. For example, Ontario wanted more flexibility in funding services that were not merely subsidies to low-income families, and they wanted cost-sharing on that funding. With respect to provincial resource centres and drop-in centres, which are for parents at home, these centres play a real role, especially in rural communities. At the present time there are approximately 130 of (them) in the province. Subsidies cannot be given for in-home care of any kind at the moment ... However, at the moment, the province cannot fund those things, and they want some flexibility.

The province of Ontario would also like to have some cost-sharing for whatever they do in the commercial sector. Even though they would like to contain that sector to some extent, I do not think they would like to lose what they already have.

However, in the opinion of a great many people, within two or three years Ontario will be left holding the financial bag. Working with assumptions that are not clear is difficult, but the feeling I have garnered in my research is that, no matter how much Ontario's share will be from the federal government, in two or three years Ontario will be bumping up against a ceiling. Federal spending has now had a new ceiling placed upon it and, although it is not clear what Ontario's share will be, there are other provinces to be considered. (Proceedings, April 12, 1988, 2:53-54)

Other provinces have not been as involved with directing the development of services, although with the exception of the Northwest Territories, they do regulate services. According to our witnesses, British Columbia does not even consider itself responsible for encouraging development. The province's chief concern is to subsidize fees for low-income parents. Subsidized parents do not have to use regulated services. There is no ministry or department engaged in assessing the need for services or in policy development. In Saskatchewan expenditures for day care services have been cut back for the last three years, and the number of licensed spaces has decreased. Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have introduced no substantive measures for a number of years. The government of New Brunswick has indicated areas where it would be inclined to develop policies. It has set up an Office of Early Childhood Services to coordinate existing programs, but at the time of our hearings no money had been budgeted for the Office.

The consequences of the proposed federal arrangements for these provinces are unclear. They could choose to expand whatever programs now exist. Or they could introduce additional measures. Witnesses from the Atlantic provinces pointed out that at present their provinces lacked the fiscal capacity to share 50% of the costs of an expanded program of any sort. They expressed doubts about whether their provinces could do so in the foreseeable future.

(So the seven years will pass under this program -) and all you will see in Newfoundland is an increase in the number of spaces and a panicky government saying, Where are we going to find a 50-cent dollar now?" (Proceedings, April 12, 1988, 2:43)

Recent statements by the Nova Scotia Minister of Community Services expressed concerns over the time-limited nature of the "catch-up" proportionate funding... ; the lack of attention to the salary issues; and the general lack of money in the package, among other issues. As of yesterday or the day before, according to a source at the Nova Scotia Advisory Council on the Status of Women, he and the department still feel that those concerns are not being adequately addressed...

The advocacy community ... in its formal and informal capacities is supporting the Nova Scotia government in its hesitations over the proposed CCCA (Canada Child Care Act), and it asks: "How does the publicity over more spaces really translate for Nova Scotia? How can the moneys be used to address the salary issue? How can the "have not" provinces support, on a 50/50 basis, seven years from now, an expanded network of day care they cannot support now? Will the ceilings under the new act make the situation worse...? ... (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:19-20)

B. Planning/Data Collection

All provinces, whatever the nature of their policies, appear to have engaged in little planning. Our witness from Quebec remarked that the province's policy up to now had lacked coherence:

There is no policy that says, "We're going to develop services in this direction, we're going to develop so many services in a home setting, so many day-care centres, etc". (Proceedings, May 3, 1988, 4:9)

We have found that Quebec is not unique in this.

Absence of planning is accompanied by very little data collection. For example, to our knowledge no province has accurate information on the demand for services. In fact the federal government has recently awarded funding for a nation-wide study which is designed to provide the necessary data in this area, among others. Up to now there have been estimates of need based on the numbers of children with parents who are working, in training or studying. As well, there have been a few studies of what services parents would prefer.

There is controversy over whether to fund for-profit services. However, provinces have not collected the information which would allow them to compare the quality of care in for-profit and non-profit services.

There is not enough information on the costs of care or the salaries of caregivers. Although all provinces subsidize child care fees for low-income parents, they very often do not know how many children are subsidized at what ages, or the incomes of families which receive subsidies.

C. For-Profit/Non-Profit Services

In 1986 about 40% of all licensed child care spaces in Canada were run by individuals or groups characterized as "commercial" or for-profit operators. But as we have indicated earlier, this figure may vary widely from province to province. In 1986 commercial operators provided 73% of the spaces in Alberta, 76% in Newfoundland, and 53% in Prince Edward Island. In Manitoba, Quebec, and Saskatchewan (which does not even license for-profit care), the percentages were of course much lower (17% , 13% and 3%, respectively). (Status of Day Care in Canada 1986, National Day Care Information Centre, Department of Health and Welfare, 1987, Table 6, p. 6).

The designation "for-profit" or "commercial" covers various types of organization. In the Atlantic provinces many of these services are owned by women (or families) who provide care in their homes, either alone or with staff. Often these are referred to as "mom and pop" operations. Commercial services may also be provided by corporations, which own the building in which services are provided, or by chains (corporations affiliated with others). Even the classification "non-profit" covers both organizations run by parent boards and, for example, an incorporated family which provides services and pays itself a salary. Available statistics do not distinguish between the types of service which can be included under the "commercial" and "non-profit" classifications.

D. Gaps in the System

It has become customary to describe child care services in terms of availability (the number of spaces there are), quality and affordability (whether parents can afford to pay for them). In all provinces, no matter what their policies, there are deficiencies in all three areas. Our witnesses pointed this out in detail, and we discuss what they said in the next chapter. What we wish to do here is to give a sense of the variety of problems which exist across Canada.

All our witnesses mentioned the absence of services for infants—children under one-and-a-half or two years old. As well, a number of provinces have a largely non-urban population whose demand for child care may be seasonal. But services flexible enough to meet the needs of these parents do not yet exist. In contrast witnesses from Alberta remarked that there were parents on waiting lists for non-profit centres in Edmonton and Calgary, but vacancy rates as great as 22% in for-profit centres.

With respect to quality, all provinces and Yukon have some regulations which set standards for services. But requirements regarding child care workers vary significantly. For example, in Nova Scotia the staff/child ratio for infants is 1:7, (that is one caregiver is allowed to look after seven infants), in Quebec 1:5, in Alberta 1:3. Newfoundland does not have regulations regarding infant care; in fact, it does not allow child care centres, the only regulated service, to admit infants. Alberta and the Northwest Territories have no standards regarding the qualifications of child care workers. Other provinces may require only a certain number of day care staff to be trained. In general no training standards are formulated for family home caregivers.

All our witnesses mentioned that there were problems with monitoring and enforcing what regulations did exist. In some provinces the regulation of child care services is part of general health and safety regulation, so that inspectors must cover many more facilities than child care centres or family day care homes. Where there is a separate agency responsible for monitoring, there may not be enough staff. Some witnesses stated that there was so much pressure to keep spaces open that inspectors were unwilling to take action against offending operators.

Finally, different provinces subsidize families at widely varying income levels. As a result it has been estimated that in some provinces only about 4% of all preschool children with working parents were eligible for full subsidies in 1987. In comparison 23% of these children in Saskatchewan and 38% in Ontario were eligible. (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, A Background Document produced by the Staff of the House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care, 1987, p. 7). However, not all parents eligible for subsidies actually receive them. Here again provinces differ. In 1987 it was estimated that in Ontario 12% of eligible preschoolers received a subsidy, compared to 83% in Alberta (Provincial Day Care Subsidy System in Canada, Table 7, p. 16). (For more details see Appendix I.)

CHAPTER II

The National Strategy on Child Care: Funding Child Care Services

A. Introduction

The federal government's child care policy, which was announced in December 1987, consists of three elements: tax assistance to families with young children; a cost-sharing program with the provinces designed to create child care spaces; and a fund for special initiatives. The last two measures are directly connected with the development of child care services, and for this reason we discuss them together in this chapter.

The tax proposals are designed in part to address the problem of "affordability", that is, the cost of child care services. One of the measures, a proposed increase in the child tax credit for children aged 6 and under, is also intended to offer some assistance to parents who stay home to care for their children. We discuss affordability in this Chapter. Support for parents who are at home with their children is a separate issue, which we discuss in Chapter III.

B. The Federal Proposals for developing child care services

The government's proposals are set out in a document entitled National Strategy on Child Care. This document was published together with statements by the Minister of Health and Welfare, who is responsible for implementing the federal/provincial cost-sharing program; the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women; and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In addition, the Honourable Jake Epp appeared before the full Senate Standing Committee on Science, Technology and Social Affairs in May 1988 and reported on the government's progress in implementing the National Strategy. The Minister's remarks, especially those in response to questions, expanded upon the government's initial statements in significant ways. In discussing the government's policy we consider all this material.

With respect to child care services, the government commits itself to a federal/provincial program to develop services, a separate federal Special Initiatives Fund—now called the Child Care Initiatives Fund - and a greater tax deduction for child care expenses for children aged 6 and under.

The aim of the federal/provincial program is to “(boost) the existing system from its current underdeveloped state into one that offers more accessible and affordable quality child care arrangements to Canadian families” (National Strategy, p. 4). In more specific terms the government proposes to help create 200,000 quality spaces throughout the country over the next seven years, and maintain the expanded system from then on. This is to be done by a series of measures.

First, the government intends to create a new set of funding arrangements for child care services. At present, the federal government shares some of the costs related to these services with the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP). However it does so only in respect of the low-income families that use the services. (For a more detailed discussion of present federal government funding of child care services through the Canada Assistance Plan, see Appendix I.) Under the proposed program the federal government will share expenditures for direct capital and operating grants to services. We have been informed that the new arrangements, rather than CAP, will also be used to share expenditures for assistance to low-income families.

The new arrangements do not involve “open-ended” funding, as does the CAP program; that is, the government is not prepared to share an indefinite amount of expenditure. In the National Strategy the government commits itself to spending up to $3 billion for the federal/provincial program during the initial seven-year period. In subsequent years it will spend up to $1 billion for the entire child care program—including tax expenditures.

The National Strategy does not discuss the cost-sharing formula proposed for these new arrangements, other than to state that during the initial seven year period capital expenditures will be shared on a 75% (federal):25% basis. However, in his appearance before the Senate Standing Committee the Minister of Health and Welfare confirmed information that the government is prepared to cost-share the expenses of less developed provincial systems on a greater than 50%:50% basis, up to 90% of expenditures.

The government's position with respect to the various sectors which may be involved in the development of child care services is not entirely clear. As we have seen, in some provinces after-school programs are provided by municipalities and school boards. Under the existing legislation (CAP), expenditures for educational services are not shared, and federal officials have taken the position that this limitation extends even to after-school programs which are run by school boards but are not part of the regular educational structure. The municipal ventures, on the other hand, are assisted through CAP. The National Strategy does not address the issue of whether the distinction between child care and educational services will be preserved under the new funding arrangements.

The National Strategy is clear, however, about the government's position regarding the private sector. Capital grants will be offered to non-profit services only, a measure which will help non-profit ventures compete with commercial ones on a more equal footing. Operating grants will be available to non-profit and commercial services alike.

These arrangements will be implemented through new federal legislation—the Canada Child Care Act. The introduction of new legislation is also a symbolic gesture. It signals the “basic social and economic priority” which the government accords the delivery of these services (National Strategy, p. 4).

The second element of the government's plans for child care services has to do with quality and standards. In the words of the National Strategy, the government “recognizes its responsibility to work with the provinces to ensure the development and implementation of the necessary standards for quality in a jointly funded child care system” (p. 5). We note with interest that the statement of the Honourable Benoit Bouchard, then Minister of Employment and Immigration, issued in connection with the announcement of the government's program, mentions that the government policy will offer substantial opportunities for training child care workers, an issue of relevance to quality. The Minister announced no ancillary measures in relation to training, but stated that his Department would review the need for training.

The last measure directly (though not solely) concerned with services is the establishment of a Fund for special child care initiatives. According to the National Strategy the proposed Fund is designed for “innovative research and development projects, and public awareness programs” (p. 3).

Given the examples of the projects which the government is prepared to include under this description, the Fund has been created to address almost all the problem areas which may not be affected by the federal/provincial program. This includes encouragement for the development of non-profit community-based services. It also includes the development of models for needed services which for various reasons the current system has failed to produce (an issue clearly related to the development of non-profit services): services to rural communities, and services for children with special cultural needs, such as immigrant and native children, or for children of shift-workers.

As well, the government sees the Fund being used for projects related to child care initiatives which employers might take, such as sponsoring a day care centre in the workplace, paying for the costs of services obtained elsewhere, or establishing a registry of available services. Training for "in-home" care (this may include both care in the child's home by a "nanny", or care in the caregiver's home) is contemplated, as is research "on integrating children with special physical, emotional or intellectual needs into the wider system". Finally, the Fund expects to support projects for "family-oriented arrangements". This phrase seems to refer to arrangements which make it easier for parents to keep their jobs while spending significant amounts of what would ordinarily be work time with their children. (All examples are taken either from the National Strategy, p. 4 or from the Statement of the Honourable Barbara McDougall, p. 2.)

The government has committed $100 million to the Fund, which will be available for the initial seven-year period. Recipients will be groups or individuals, not the provinces. However, in his statement to the Standing Committee the Honourable Jake Epp made it clear that the provinces will somehow be involved in the administration of the Fund, in order to ensure that the projects which are selected are in tune with provincial planning.

C. Testimony Regarding the Federal/Provincial Program

Witnesses expressed many concerns and fears about the federal/provincial program. Some of these concerns related to the program as a whole, others centred around the implications of the program for particular provinces. We have grouped our witnesses' comments into three categories. The first has to do with the adequacy of the funds allocated to the program, and the fact that the program is not open-ended. The second involves issues relating to the quality of care: the need for standards, the need for trained caregivers and problems associated with the funding of commercial services. The third, which is related to the first two, concerns the role of the federal government in directing the program.

(i) Adequacy of Funding

Witnesses questioned the ability of the program to support the creation of 200,000 new spaces, given their own calculations regarding the cost of a space. They suggested that wage increases are inevitable for child care workers, and that government projections could not have taken these increases into consideration:

As I understand it, the federal government intends to provide 200,000 new spaces over the next seven years. According to my research, they have used the current figures for child care cost per space and have added in the cost of living over the next 10 years. If that is the formula they used, I do not believe they can develop 200,000 new spaces. Child care is in its infancy and has not plateaued yet. Child care workers receive salaries of $14,000 per year. As you are probably aware, that is the same amount paid to parking lot attendants and zookeepers. Salaries will have to go up significantly if we are to recognize child care work as a profession, that trained individuals must provide the care, and that children are valued. This situation is complicated by the fact that most child care workers are women and the income is very low. You have to build in the cost because the program is underfunded. I believe the cost over the next seven years will involve more than just the cost-of-living index. For example, if the salary at the entry level were where it should be, I believe that the government will only be able to create 100,000 new spaces under the program. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:42)

Looking now at the basic carrying costs of care, such factors as pay equity have not been taken into account (by the federal government). Pay equity will play a significant role in those costs, even though currently the workers in most child care programs are not yet included in the pay equity legislation. There is also the cost of inflation in child care. I think we face a real problem... (Proceedings, April 12, 1988, 2:54)

Witnesses feared that the federal program was less generous than CAP. Some referred to studies which indicate the considerable capacity CAP has for funding child care services. For example, a background document for the House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care, entitled Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, concludes that if all provinces were to adopt the federal guidelines for granting subsidies under CAP, 72% of Canadian children under age 6 with working parents would be eligible for either a full or partial subsidy. According to the same document, under current provincial guidelines, which are all less generous than the federal guidelines, 43% of these children are eligible for some support, and only 15% in fact receive support. The witness from Manitoba spoke of a federal government study which estimated that funding for day care under CAP could reach $3.6 billion.

Witnesses also feared that the ceiling on the new program might lead provinces to reduce expenditures for fee subsidies to low income families.

...I would like to talk about the traditional view of child care as a service for low income families situated in the Canada Assistance Plan. The reality of this new funding (program) is that provinces such as Ontario will be forced to make hard choices... Assuming that there is a limit on the amount of money the provincial governments will get from this new plan, these governments will have to choose among the following: subsidies to low income or moderate income families; expansion of the system; providing direct funding to improve wages to keep trained people within the system, because presently they leave the system in droves; improving the quality of programs, which will have to be dealt with in different ways...

The bottom line is, what will happen to single parents who are on low incomes, people who, without child care, will be forced out of the labour force, will be unable to enter the labour force or will be unable to get training? I am not suggesting that this is happening in Ontario... I am suggesting that the possibility of it happening is much greater. At present, it is possible for subsidies from the federal government to flow to the provinces because CAP is an open-ended program. Under this strategy, there is a limitation on the source of the money coming from the federal government, which presents a whole new ball game. (Proceedings, April 12, 1988, 2:55)

We would add a comment to what our witnesses said with respect to fee subsidies. The study referred to earlier, Provincial Day Care Subsidies in Canada, indicates that present expenditures for fee subsidies are not adequate. In some provinces, the income levels which determine eligibility are so low that few parents qualify for a subsidy. There is strong evidence to suggest that in all provinces, whatever the eligibility level, a significant number of eligible parents do not receive subsidies. Furthermore, in some provinces, there is a considerable difference between the full subsidy and the day care fee, so that parents receiving a full subsidy may not be fully subsidized. (For more details see Appendix I of this Report.)

Finally, as we indicated in Chapter I, witnesses from Quebec and Ontario were concerned that the ceiling on the program might penalize populous provinces with well-established programs or plans for expansion. In contrast, witnesses from the Atlantic provinces feared that their provinces would not be able to afford half of the expenditures of a program developed under the more generous cost-sharing formula of the first seven years.

(ii) Quality: National Standards; Training for Caregivers; Funding the Non-Profit Sector

Witnesses thought it obvious that a national policy for child care should attempt to provide an adequate service for all Canadian children. While they assumed that standards would vary from province to province, they expected the federal government to require provinces to have whatever regulations were necessary for good quality care, as well as to help provinces develop these regulations. Witnesses were, of course, aware that the federal government does not have the power to stipulate requirements which are so specific that they amount to interference with the administration of the provincial programs.

We need a recognition of national standards that goes beyond the general statement we now have (in the National Strategy). In general, our position for some time has been that the federal government ... needs to take the lead and the initiative in this regard. The federal government needs to emphasize the fundamental necessity for a child care system that extends across the country. Regardless of where Canadians live, we should all be guaranteed some basic level of child care... (Proceedings, April 21, 1988, 3:22)

...I imagine that there would be a federal framework similar to the Canada Health Act. I think "standards" is a confusing word. I see "standards" to mean a specific and discrete item, but when one talks about criteria — which is a better way of framing it — I imagine that the federal government would have established some criteria that would imply what the provincial standards should look like.

...

...I would go as far as one could constitutionally in having federal child care standards in terms of staff—child ratios, training and things of that nature. (Proceedings, April 12, 1988, 2:62)

Because there are problems with monitoring and enforcing standards which do exist, witnesses felt that there should be federal direction in this area as well.

...There are insufficient consultants (four for the entire province of New Brunswick, some of whom fill casual positions) to ensure that regulations are properly enforced. One visit and one spot check per year are inadequate to ensure that minimum standards of care are met. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1A:5)

Witnesses thought that a national program should address issues relevant to the training of child care workers. Our witness from Manitoba, who has been involved in running a number of day care centres, remarked on the skills which caregivers generally develop after a two-year program:

We notice a difference in their flexibility with the children, their programming, their behaviour-management policies.' (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:52)

She also pointed out that it is the workers with a two-year diploma or greater qualifications who are likely to make a long-term commitment to child care.

Equally important was what the demand for training entails. First and foremost for our witnesses, training implies higher salaries. They emphasized that salaries are low in comparison to most other work, and that this has resulted in workers leaving the field. As well, there are no financial incentives to acquire more training.

Another tiny example, but a relatively important one, about the staffing of programs is that we do try to require trained people in our province, because the regulations read that way even though they are not policed very well. The basic training consists of approximately 18 months of post-secondary education. If a person wishes to work in the toddler or infant centres, that person is required to take an extra year's training. If that person then ends up working in the toddler program, that person can be guaranteed to earn less than those who have received less training (and work with pre-schoolers)... Because there is no other funding but the parent fee, even if the parent fee is doubled for children under the age of three, we still end up not being able to pay those with a higher education more money.

We are trying to hire in that category right now and we cannot get trained staff, and we are one of the best day care centres in the province. No one is being encouraged to go into the field. (Proceedings, April 21, 1988, 3:13-14)

Concerning the quality issue, the main factor we see now is the salaries issue, in that in Nova Scotia the regulations provide for basic quality protection. But this issue, currently centering mainly around wages for child care workers, is one that both the Nova Scotia government and the child care community have agreed upon. Parents on waiting lists are more interested in spaces. As one researcher clearly put it, "spaces are sexy." However, the wage issue does not go away and is not addressed by the (federal) strategy. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:21)

Secondly, the demand for training makes it necessary to develop training programs. Some provinces do not offer even a basic child care program. Where programs do exist, they may not be easily accessible to child care workers. In many cases, caregivers cannot afford to take time off to attend courses, and must do so after a full working day. Subsidies for training would help in this situation, but they are scarce.

... there is not any full-time training in the Yukon at the moment. A projected program is to be included in the Yukon college in January of 1989. The course-by-course training that is currently available would take 10 years to complete. That means that anyone in day care now would have to spend their evenings and their weekends doing homework and on the course. There are no funds available to subsidize these people to go to school. (Proceedings, April 21, 1988, 3:28)

Finally, witnesses raised a number of concerns about the proposal to allow the commercial sector to access federal government funds through the cost-sharing of operating grants. They suggested that it is not possible to make a profit by providing child care services without compromising quality:

... quality services are very expensive. Complying with the regulations is also a very costly process. Parents contribute very little money (towards the cost of care), but they can't really pay more than they do now. To ensure quality services, given the revenue they have, day care centres must make a choice. Either they pay their staff minimum wage and contend with a constant turnover and very little stability or they hire unqualified people so they can pay less money. They cheat a bit on the (staff/child) ratios in order to make a profit. Something has to give somewhere. No one has yet to show me how to earn a profit by operating a centre which boasts services of impeccable quality. (Proceedings, May 3, 1988, 4:18)

The same point was made by a witness who runs an in-home day care centre — a nominally for-profit venture:

(These) private, in-home day care centres are the backbone of child care in New Brunswick. They are located in residential neighbourhood settings, and that has appeal for the many working parents who want their children to stay in their own neighbourhood environment. These centres have great difficulty operating on a break-even basis. For most operators, profit is unheard of.

...

It may be necessary to provide subsidization simply to ensure their survival. I am referring to the small family day care. High quality and profitability do not go hand in hand. I think this should be underlined... It is important that facilities receiving public funding must meet quality care standards, provide public disclosures and are accountable for their financial situations. They must, as well, have an open style of management such as parent participation... (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:8)

Witnesses mentioned the importance of parent participation in the running of child care services, which for most of them was incompatible with commercial ownership. One witness referred to the distinction between the "objective" elements of quality, which can be regulated, and the "subjective" elements, which cannot. Training for caregivers, child/staff ratios, hygiene and cleanliness all belong in the first category. In the second are to be found the "emotional atmosphere", the program content, the relations between staff and parents and the transmission of values:

... everything, in short, that isn't quantifiable and can't be written into the (regulations), but which in fact makes the difference between a good service and a service. (Proceedings, May 3, 1988, 4:11)

Parent direction and management was proposed as the most likely vehicle for supplying these unquantifiable determinants of quality.

A third concern was that the federal government was not giving enough encouragement to the non-profit sector, an omission which could prevent the expansion of services.

I have included a couple of possible scenarios concerning space development over the next seven years.

First, scenario one. Given the likelihood that both the commercial and the voluntary sector will be able to access government assistance in the forms of parental subsidies, the commercial sector will move faster and into the attractive demographic clusters. What might these be? Clearly, they will be those that are the easiest to serve, with high-population densities and middle (income) groups, leaving the difficult and expensive areas to the voluntary sector.

A strength, if there is one at all in current Nova Scotian child care, is its relatively non-ghettoized nature. The centres with subsidized spaces also have varying numbers of non-subsidized children, guaranteeing that poor kids are not completely segregated from the more fortunate. This mix would probably diminish under the new model, with the more affluent children siphoned off by a reverse magnet school approach.

The voluntary sector, which in the child care world has practically disappeared in Nova Scotia in the last 10 years because of the freeze on the development of more subsidized centres and spaces, will be a long time in revitalizing. Will the likeliest areas and the limited spaces disappear before this sector regroups? Will the realization that its form—that is, non-profit child care—gets no special status, such as access to subsidization, ... destroy this service mode? This is certainly a possibility in Nova Scotia. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:20-21)

...It is more expensive to provide quality day care to kids who are malnourished, who do not get decent dental care or who come from families that are in disarray. I would expect that people in such areas would not attract the entrepreneurial impulse quite so quickly. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:26)

(iii) The Federal Role

Underlying all these concerns was the desire for stronger leadership from the federal government in the development of a national child care system. Witnesses wanted funding to be adequate, but they also wanted the federal government to ensure that provinces had standards necessary for good quality care, that caregivers were properly trained and adequately paid, and that services were owned and managed by those who were interested in children rather than profit.

In addition, witnesses remarked on the gap between the objective of increasing spaces and the actions necessary to achieve the objective—a gap which the National Strategy does not bridge. They stressed that child care services should not be allowed to grow willy-nilly in the absence of proper planning to match services to needs.

I then speak of a "necessary space" scenario, which would include real needs assessments, non-profit auspices (only) getting monetary support ..., and targeted geographical areas; some planning by a government-user-provider group is then surely appropriate. Some of the federal funding needs to be allocated for this purpose as well as for simply more space. (Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:21)

Witnesses from British Columbia raised another issue relevant to the role of the federal government. They noted that the government of that province had indicated its intention not to spend money on operating grants, but to allocate all expenditures to capital grants and fee subsidies for low-income parents. They added that current subsidy arrangements were far from being able to support existing centre spaces, and that many centres were in a precarious financial position. They predicted that this situation would continue even with an increased budget for fee subsidies, and that centres would close and open again in order to obtain capital funding, which they would in effect use to cover operating expenses. These witnesses were making two points. First, that no new spaces would in fact be created as a result of the capital expenditure, despite the federal government's efforts. Second, that it was as important to improve the condition of the existing system as to increase spaces, an objective which the National Strategy does not discuss.

If we do not stabilize what exists, those facilities will choose to close and open up again with the start-up funds... I would like to see capital funds that relate not only to new spaces but also to strengthening and repairing existing spaces... If a new facility opens up down the street, it will sound the death knell of those facilities that already exist. We need to keep the existing supply before we add to it. Then we need to add to it in an organized way that responds to the needs of the community. That does not mean sending out little questionnaires to the licensing people, as the provincial government has done, asking that they find out what the fees are in their area and whether there are waiting lists. That is the questionnaire they call a needs assessment... (The second priority, then,) is policy planning and needs assessment. (Proceedings, April 21, 1988, 3:21-22)

Most of our witnesses had strongly supported a new funding arrangement and new legislation for the development of child care services. However, they now prefer the Canada Assistance Plan as an interim measure, unless the federal proposals are changed in a way that would satisfy the concerns which they raise.

D. The Subcommittee's Response to the Testimony

The federal government's proposals were intended to initiate a round of negotiations with the provinces and the territories. The outcome of the negotiations will be a set of federal/provincial agreements and, on the federal side, enabling legislation which Parliament must examine and pass. The purpose of this Report is not to evaluate the initial federal proposals. Evaluation is appropriate when the agreements have been signed and legislation is introduced. In this section of the Report, we raise issues which must be addressed in examining the legislation and the policy which it incorporates.

Is the Funding Adequate?

Our witnesses' concerns about the adequacy of funding are important. But there are problems with the arguments which they present. For example, witnesses pointed to the potential of CAP to generate $3.6 billion for day care services. However, in his appearance before the full Standing Committee, the Minister of Health and Welfare made it clear that one arrives at this figure only by making a number of assumptions. First, all provinces are expected to raise the income levels at which parents qualify for fee subsidies to the levels permitted by the federal government. Second, provinces are assumed to increase their child care expenditures to allow subsidization for all parents who qualify. Third, the services which parents need are supposed to exist, and all parents decide to use them rather than rely on private arrangements such as relatives or nannies. (Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, First proceedings on: The Study of Child Care, 7:13-14.)

But the facts belie these assumptions. For various reasons, the provinces do not currently use CAP to its fullest potential. What, then, is the force of the argument that CAP is richer than the proposed program?

Witnesses suggested that the new program should receive at least as much money as would have been available under CAP. What is the right way to determine this amount? One witness suggested that for the "boost" period it should be assumed that expenditures would increase at the same rate as the previous seven years (Second proceedings, 2:21, Alberta). However, it is equally reasonable to assume that budgets in some provinces would not continue to grow at their previous rate in the absence of a federal initiative. One would also have to make a number of assumptions about the cost of care. Would it go up only by the rate of inflation? Would it be affected by an increased demand for child care services? What would be the impact of provincial salary enhancement grants?

Finally, witnesses expressed concern about the proposed ceiling on the federal government's contribution. We are not convinced that the existence of a ceiling is by itself a reason to reject the federal proposal. The present funding arrangements for child care services are open-ended because they are a part of CAP, a program designed to provide support for those with little or no earnings. It is hard to imagine the basis on which we as a society could reasonably set a ceiling on this kind of program; how could we ever distinguish among those eligible to benefit from it?

The objectives of a national child care initiative are not those of CAP. The aim of the child care program is to create a system of services across Canada, a system which does not yet exist. This endeavour requires the cooperation of provincial governments. Since the provinces are at different stages of development, it is reasonable to expect the program to proceed in stages. This process of building a system is not necessarily inconsistent with funding ceilings.

The real concern with respect to funding for the new program is not whether the provinces could have received more money under CAP. It is whether the money which the federal government commits to the program will be enough to accomplish the objectives set for each stage of development. In this context, the existence of a funding ceiling does pose difficult practical problems. Witnesses predicted that some provinces would be prepared to develop more quickly than the federal government had projected. Subsequent events have proved them right. Should the federal government fund all proposals which meet program objectives regardless of the cost of these programs, as our witnesses propose? If not, how should the total budget for the federal program be divided so as to treat each province fairly and, at the same time, allow all provinces to improve and expand their services?

Will Standards Be Set and Enforced?

There can be no compromise between the need to increase spaces and the need to have good services. Priority must be given to maintaining and developing services of adequate quality across Canada. This goal cannot be achieved without minimum national standards.

Will provinces commit themselves to developing, implementing and enforcing reasonable standards concerning training for caregivers, child/caregiver ratios and group size, programming and health and safety? Will the commitment be embodied in the federal legislation?

By a commitment to minimum standards we mean that provinces agree to devise standards and produce a timetable for implementing and enforcing them. By reasonable standards with respect to training or the relationship between children and caregivers, we mean standards which are compatible with current knowledge of child development. For example, most studies of infants—children under the age of two years—indicate that they need to be cared for by someone who is continually available, attentive and responsive to them. Among other things, this suggests that caregiver/child ratios must be low: one person cannot be expected to be properly responsive to seven crying babies. Of course, in general, what is known about child development will not dictate a single set of standards. Individual provinces will then have to determine what is reasonable.

What Provisions Will There Be For Training Caregivers?

We support our witnesses' position that training is an essential component of quality. Child care workers must receive adequate training if they are to care for children properly. Given that caregivers are expected to be trained and child care services are expected to expand, and given the introduction of pay equity legislation in some provinces, it is likely that expenditures for caregivers' salaries will rise significantly.

How will the federal/provincial arrangements promote training? What actions will governments be prepared to take to ensure that child care workers are well trained? Will federal and provincial governments take salary increases into consideration in determining funding arrangements?

How Will Standards Be Implemented?

It is unlikely that provinces will be in a position to implement all the necessary standards when they sign an agreement with the federal government. Requirements for trained caregivers can only be met after courses have been introduced and people have attended them. Proper monitoring and enforcement and growing salaries will necessitate increased expenditure for services. It is reasonable to expect provinces to absorb the additional costs gradually. Nonetheless, provinces could commit themselves to certain targets with respect to standards. These targets could differ from province to province, depending on the stage of development which services had reached.

Will provinces be asked to commit themselves to achieving specific objectives regarding standards in the initial period? What other assurance will there be that provinces will set and enforce standards?

Will Growth in the For-Profit Sector Be Contained, and Growth in the Non-Profit Sector Promoted?

Parents and others in the community who are concerned about children should be giving direction to caregivers, whether they work in centres or in their own homes. It is often said that standards and regulations cannot ensure quality. We agree. It is committed people who breathe life into regulations. In the case of child care, the commitment is most likely to come from those who have an interest in children which is independent of their livelihood.

From this it follows that a child care system should be developed by the not-for-profit rather than the commercial sector. We stress that by "not-for-profit" we are not referring to just any corporation without share capital which provides child care services; but rather to an organization whose board of directors is made up of parents and others who care about what happens to the children whom they are serving.

We acknowledge the dedication and energy of all those women (and they are mostly women) who, with no support, have established services in places where none would have existed otherwise. While they are commercial operators in terms of organization, they are genuinely interested in providing quality services, and often do so with very little, if any, cash benefit to themselves. However, if one is interested in creating a real child care system, the time has come to use this energy within a non-profit structure. It is not likely that the prospect of working with a parent board would deter most of those women or men who, in the past, would have established a service on their own. Clearly, our witnesses who are commercial operators do not expect a significant monetary return on their capital. A national program which encourages the non-profit sector would provide necessary support for the efforts of those who want to care for children, and would ensure that they receive adequate compensation.

In short, governments should not be funding new commercial services through capital or operating grants, or fee subsidies, or by any other means. However, a case may be made for funding existing services, which the province of Ontario has chosen to do. For-profit operators are an important part of the current system. If funding were denied them, a significant number of spaces might be removed from the system. It is also unfair to change the rules under which for-profit owners reasonably expected to operate. Of course, children should not suffer as a result of misplaced concern for the commercial sector. However, if standards are in place and strictly enforced, children should not suffer. This may be an uneasy compromise. But it is a compromise which will result in a better child care system for the future.

It is not easy to build a public service from the "grass roots". Should the federal government limit the cost-sharing of expenditures for commercial services to existing services? Will the federal/provincial agreements incorporate other kinds of incentives designed to encourage the growth of the non-profit sector?

There has been much debate over whether and how the commercial sector should be subsidized. Yet there are no data which would allow the independent evaluation or comparison of the quality of commercial and non-profit services. Will this issue be addressed by the federal/provincial arrangements?

Will Fee Subsidies Be Improved?

It is clear that the federal/provincial program should directly address the issue of fee subsidies. All parents at the lowest end of the income scale in each province should receive a subsidy for the full cost of care. Eligibility levels should be raised to provide an adequate subsidy for parents who are not poor, but who nonetheless find it difficult to pay the full price of care.

These changes cannot take place overnight. But it is not unreasonable to work toward these goals in stages. Will the federal/provincial agreements incorporate reasonable targets for improving the adequacy and coverage of subsidies?

How Will New Spaces Be Developed?

The federal/provincial program should address the need for more spaces. However, the number of spaces which the program initially creates is not the only concern. The development of spaces should be subject to some control in order to ensure that all necessary services are provided. Moreover, expansion is not the only objective of a child care program. Provinces must also improve the quality and affordability of services in ways suggested earlier.

What is it reasonable to ask of provinces with respect to increasing spaces? Should provinces agree to provide a significant number of additional spaces? What is significant might differ for each province, and would depend on such factors as the need for additional services, which could be determined by a needs assessment by the province, and on proposed expenditures for other aspects of the provincial program.

What is the Role of the Federal Government?

We agree with witnesses who stressed the importance of federal direction in the area of child care. The role of the federal government should not be merely to facilitate the maintenance and expansion of current arrangements. These arrangements are inadequate, and "more of the same" will not solve the problem. What is needed are child care programs across Canada of reasonable quality available to all parents who want them at a cost which they can afford. This objective cannot be reached unless all provinces agree to develop services to this end. The federal government is responsible for achieving the required consensus.

Provinces are at different stages with respect to child care policies. This means that the federal initiative must support the evolution of relatively new programs as well as the development of more established ones. Moreover, child care programs are costly, and governments must be fiscally responsible. Thus the federal initiative cannot be expected to create a fully developed child care system in seven years. But it can be expected to create a base from which such a system can grow.

The statements in the National Strategy are sometimes compared unfavourably with the provisions of the Canada Health Act. The comparison is unfair. The Canada Health Act is the culmination of a process which began almost 40 years earlier. The federal child care program is in its infancy. However, the history of the development of Canada's health care system does yield valuable lessons for those interested in the evolution of a child care system. Throughout the process, the federal government managed to give direction while respecting the constitutional position of the provinces. Many of the financial arrangements the federal government negotiated during that time were not essentially different from those which could be proposed with respect to child care. Surely, what was done once can be done again.

It follows that the federal government should offer financial assistance to the provinces on conditions. What conditions will be incorporated into the federal/provincial agreements or into the forthcoming legislation?

What conditions is it reasonable to attach to federal funding? Should provinces be required to formulate plans for the development of child care services? Should they be required to set targets for implementing standards, improving fee subsidies and increasing spaces? Should provinces be asked to evaluate their programs and to collect data on a basis which permits comparative evaluation? Should the federal government attempt to constrain the development of commercial services? What, if any, conditions should be put into legislation at this time, and what should be left to individual federal/provincial agreements?

We see a significant federal role in directing the development of child care programs across Canada. But it is the provinces which implement the programs. We wonder whether it would not be beneficial to have a mechanism that would allow provinces to consult with each other and with the federal government on child care issues. The Council of Ministers of Education is an example of this kind of forum.

Consultation could result in a concerted effort to develop programs. This, in turn, would help in the planning of federal funding arrangements. It could also serve to spread information about new initiatives. Finally, consultation would not only encourage the development of services within individual provinces, but would itself promote the development of a national child care system.

E. The Child Care Initiatives Fund

Witnesses acknowledged the need for such a Fund and commended the government for having introduced the measure. At the same time, however, they raised some concerns about the Fund. Many wondered whether the money was to be distributed equitably across Canada, or whether it was to be allocated on a "first come first served" basis. One witness pointed out that those most likely to think of novel and effective ways of providing services not now available were the parents who needed them; at the same time, they were the least likely to know about the Fund and the least adept at applying for grants. She proposed that the government make an effort to tap this resource rather than rely on more familiar groups. She also offered suggestions as to how this might be done.

For instance, a village on the north shore of Cape Breton Island might have the beginnings of an idea that could be developed with technical support into an appropriate, responsible proposal that would access real dollars. Perhaps they could call it a pilot demonstration, and perhaps it could be replicated in other places. It would require that some of the moneys in the special initiatives part of the program be made available for this kind of consultative or support structure, to provide troubleshooting services, and so forth. After seven years, we might have some models in those unusual areas...
(Proceedings, April 5, 1988, 1:60)

While we agree with the concerns expressed by our witnesses, we have additional comments and reservations. Given the variety of projects which the Fund can support, there seems to be a need to establish priorities. This need became even clearer after we heard the Minister of Health and Welfare speak on the subject of the government's commitment to the development of child care services within native communities. This is an area of special concern to us, although we decided not to address native services in this Report because we felt the subject merited separate treatment.

The Minister pointed out that the government did not yet have "a clear understanding of what 'child care' might entail within the cultural context of our Native communities, what form its delivery might take, and what the needs of different communities might be" (Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, Proceedings, May 10, 1988, – The Study on Child Care, 7:9). We believe that a portion of the Fund should be assigned to native child care, to ensure that the required programs are developed and funding requests are not rejected because others have submitted their applications first.

We would favour another allocation directed toward encouraging the efforts of the non-profit sector. We agree with our witness from Nova Scotia, who suggested that the government promote use of the Fund by parent and community groups, and not simply rely on the proposals of groups skilled in the art of applying for grants.

Initiatives have already been developed in a number of areas independently of the Fund—in particular, services for rural areas and employer arrangements related to child care. We liked the suggestion, also offered by our witness from Nova Scotia, that the government encourage competition among projects which address similar needs. One way to do this would be to award funds to projects only if the sponsors could interest other groups in using their model. This, in turn, would involve the setting up of some sort of exchange where people could find out about the projects and decide what they could use.

The flexibility and openness of the Child Care Initiatives Fund give rise to a number of questions. How will priorities for funding be set? Will a specific amount be designated for native communities in particular? Will the Fund provide support to help groups formulate grant proposals? What mechanisms for information exchange have been built into the process?

Finally, we believe that support for “family-oriented arrangements”, that is, measures for parents who take care of their own children, deserves separate consideration. We discuss this further in the next chapter.

CHAPTER III

The National Strategy on Child Care: Support for Parents who Spend Significant Amounts of Time out of the Labour Force

One of the goals of the National Strategy as a whole is to enhance parental choice with respect to child care. There are parents who choose to stay home either full-time or part-time to care for their children. Some may never use child care services, some may. Parents who work part-time may arrange their work schedules in a way which allows them to care for their children without the help of another person. Parents who are not in the labour force may enrol their children in some form of group activity. When children are between ages 4 and 6 these services may be run by the school board as nursery or kindergarten programs. In some provinces, however, these services are considered to be day care and are regulated and funded as such.

There are no measures in the National Strategy which are targeted exclusively to parents who do not use child care services. However, one of the tax measures, a proposed increase to the child tax credit of $200 per year, was designed to benefit this group of parents. In speaking to the full Standing Committee in May 1987, the Honourable Jake Epp made the following remarks in response to a question about the effectiveness of this measure in relation to the choice to stay home:

I have never pretended that the child tax credit ... (was a) compensation for mothers who stayed at home. I have never characterized it in that way, but I thought it was important that the government should give recognition to that area of child care as against simply coming in with a formal child day care system as advocated by some. (Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, First proceedings on the Study on Child Care, May 10, 1988, 7:27)

Our witnesses representing parents who do not use child care services felt that much more could be done to support their choice. They did not propose many specific measures, because they had neither the time nor the expertise to develop and evaluate them. They did ask that tax measures regarding child care affect parents who use services and those who do not in comparable ways. They pointed out that the increase in the child care expense deduction would benefit middle or higher income parents in the labour force, and that the benefit would increase with income; by contrast the increase in the child tax credit would only benefit lower income parents who were at home. Our witnesses also proposed that the tax system be neutral as between two-earner and single-earner couples. Finally, they suggested that the Federal Initiative should give "equitable benefits to all parents to use as they choose" and that the benefits be "tied to financial need". Another witness who wrote to us proposed that for every dollar spent on child care services a dollar be available to parents at home to use as they wish.

These parents raise an important question which does not have an easy answer: How can parents reconcile labour force participation with child care? There was a time when this was not a problem. Mothers took care of children and, unless the family was very poor, had no significant contact with the labour force. Fathers worked and were not expected to be involved in raising children in the same way as mothers. The tax system, family income support systems and the labour force were designed to fit this way of life.

This is another time. Any child care policy must assume that both mothers and fathers will have a significant labour force attachment over the course of their lifetimes, and that both will have a significant part to play in raising their children. In this context we see support for parents at home in terms of policies which make it easier for them to move in and out of the labour force. This might include some form of income assistance.

There are a number of important considerations regarding the care of very young children. Our witnesses felt strongly that parents are the best people to care for infants—children up to two years old. Most parents would like to be given more time with their infants than they are now. As well the cost of infant child care is great: desirable staff/child ratios are small, and it is important to keep infants in small groups to avoid the spread of disease. These considerations point to an enhanced maternity benefit program of the sort proposed by the Katie Cooke Task Force or the House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care.

However, income assistance cannot be the only answer. One cannot compensate at-home parents forever. Somehow the workforce must be made more accommodating to parents. There have been any number of proposals as to how this might be done: job-sharing, flexible work hours, family responsibility leave. Until governments at both levels and leaders in the business world work seriously to implement some of these proposals, there can be no more than token policies for parents at home.

For these reasons the proposal that the government give comparable benefits to parents at home and parents in the workforce is perhaps not the best way to approach the issue. Parents who need day care services should have them. But there should also be policies for parents who work and want to spend a significant amount of time with their children. The federal and provincial governments are responsible for developing these policies. Governments at both levels, businesses, and parents themselves should be prepared to pay the costs of these policies.

We have not examined the tax proposals which are a part of the National Strategy. However, the suggestions of our witnesses with respect to the neutrality of the tax system have merit, and should be seriously considered by the government.

APPENDIX I

The Day Care Subsidy Under the Canada Assistance Plan

A. The Legislation

According to the Preamble of the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP), the legislation recognizes a federal responsibility to help provide "adequate assistance to and in respect of persons in need" and prevent and remove "the cause of poverty and dependence on public assistance". The Preamble goes on to state the purpose of the legislation: to encourage "the further development and extension of assistance and welfare services programs throughout Canada by sharing more fully with the provinces in the costs thereof".

The Preamble draws a distinction between assistance and prevention, and between assistance and welfare services. These distinctions are repeated in the body of the Act. The Act defines two kinds of provincial expenditure which may be cost-shared: expenditures for assistance to persons in need, and expenditures for welfare services for those in need or those "who are likely to become persons in need".

Assistance is defined as "aid in any form" for the purpose of providing any of the needs enumerated in the Act. These include food, shelter, clothing and other basic necessities. However, they also include certain welfare services purchased by or at the request of a provincially approved agency. These services are not set out in the Act, but are prescribed by regulation. No conditions are placed on the nature of the service which may be provided. Day care is one of the prescribed services. Others include rehabilitation services, casework, counselling and homemaker services.

As well, the Act requires a province to administer a needs test in order to determine whether a person is in need, and therefore eligible for assistance. This involves obtaining a statement of the person's income and expenses.

The provisions with respect to welfare services are different. As a condition for the cost-sharing of these expenditures, the services must be provided by a "provincially approved agency". That term has been interpreted to exclude for-profit services.

Unlike the phrase "person in need", the term "person likely to be in need" is not defined. The definition has been left to federal officials. Over the years two different sets of guidelines have been issued by the Department of Health and Welfare. They will be discussed in detail in the next section. Both sets of guidelines have allowed provinces to administer income tests to determine likelihood of need. This means that eligibility does not have to be determined by requiring parents to reveal the details of their financial circumstances, but simply by ensuring that their total income falls below certain levels.

Costs which relate to the provision of assistance or welfare services are shareable on a 50%-50% basis. Most costs which one might think of including in this description are shareable, though some are not. What is very important, the program is open-ended; that is, there are no federal limits on total provincial expenditure.

There are two types of shareable cost under CAP. The fee charged for a welfare service is shareable under the assistance provisions. The portion of the total expenditure for a welfare service which can be attributed to a user who is likely to be in need is also shareable, under the welfare services provisions. However in this case expenditures for direct capital expenses, such as the cost of buying property in which the service is housed, are excluded.

With respect to day care services, the effect of these rather complicated provisions is that the government will cost-share any provincial subsidies for day care fees so long as the parents are given a needs test. In that case the services may be provided by for-profit or non-profit operators. However, if a province wants to administer an income test, the parent must use a not-for-profit service. In neither case are provinces required to regulate day care services.

As well, the federal government will share the portion of provincial expenditures for non-profit services which can be ascribed to low-income users, whether these expenditures are made through a fee subsidy program or any other funding arrangement. There are few restrictions on allowable expenditures by non-profit day care services. Regulations specifically include as allowable expenditures salaries and benefits, research and consultation for the benefit of day care staff, registration fees for conferences which staff may attend, fees for training of staff, and even such capital costs as depreciation on the building, and the costs of play equipment and materials used by the service.

B. Likelihood of Need Guidelines for Welfare Services

In 1974 the Department of Health and Welfare established a set of policy guidelines relating to the provision of day care services under CAP. The guidelines described two sets of criteria which parents would have to meet if expenditures were to be shared. The first had to do with the need for the service. To be eligible parents had to be:

- (i) single parents who were working, taking a training or rehabilitation program or undergoing medical treatment; or
- (ii) a two-parent family where both parents were working or one was working and the other was taking a training program, etc.; or
- (iii) either a single or two-parent family where a social welfare agency referred the child to day care for the child's protection or developmental benefit.

The second set of criteria had to do with financial ability to pay. This was to be determined by a needs test or an income test, or a combination of both. Parents could be partially subsidized, but no parent could receive any subsidy if the family income was greater than twice the income at which parents were eligible for a full subsidy. There were other restrictions on the income test which need not be described here. (Canada, Health and Welfare Canada, Policy Guidelines Relating to the Provision of Day Care Services for Children Under the Canada Assistance Plan, Ottawa: March 1974, pp. 1-2.)

In 1983 the Department published new likelihood of need guidelines, applicable to all welfare services. The intention of the guidelines was to extend support to a broader range of families. These guidelines are still in effect. The guidelines eliminate the "social need" criteria. Also, instead of imposing specific conditions on provincial income tests, they describe a set of federal income levels which act as a ceiling on provincial tests. The federal levels are based on public pension benefits and, like these benefits, are indexed quarterly.

Some studies have been done on the potential the new federal guidelines have to affect the provision of day care services. One is an unpublished study undertaken by the staff of the Department of Health and Welfare. The study was referred to by one of the Subcommittee's witnesses during its hearings, and was mentioned by the Honourable Jake Epp in his presentation before the full Committee in May 1988. According to this document if the provinces all adopted the federal government income levels, and actually subsidized all eligible parents with preschool children (including single-earner couples), the federal government's share of the expenditures would be around $3.6 billion (in 1985 dollars). This calculation also has consequences for the entire CAP program, since expenditures for the whole program amounted to a little over $4 billion in fiscal year 1986-87.

A background document prepared for the House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care tried to determine how many preschool children of working parents (this excludes single-earner couples, among others) would be eligible for subsidy if the provinces adopted the federal levels. The study estimated that across Canada 46% of these children would be eligible for full subsidy and 72% would be eligible for partial subsidy. (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, A Background Document produced by the Staff of the Special Committee on Child Care, 1987, Table 9, p. 21.)

In fact the provinces' income eligibility levels for social services in general, and for day care in particular, are far below the federal guidelines. According to the same background study, in 1987 only 19% of preschool children were eligible for full subsidy under the various provincial requirements (46% under the federal levels) and only 43% were eligible for partial subsidy (72% under the federal levels). (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, Tables 7-8, pp. 16-18.)

C. Provincial Day Care Subsidy Programs

One cannot say that all provinces have tailored their programs to the federal legislation. For example, as we indicate in our Report, there is a significant number of for-profit services in many provinces. Yet only Ontario and the Northwest Territories impose a needs test on parents who apply for a day care subsidy. As a result some provinces will subsidize parents who use for-profit services, even though they cannot share the cost with the federal government.

Most provinces retain some form of the "needs" criteria of the earlier guidelines. As we have already remarked, all have chosen not to move to the federal income levels. The provinces vary, though, in how close they come to these levels. Under the federal guidelines (January – March 1987) a single-parent family with one child could receive a full subsidy if the parent's after-tax income was about $24,000 or less. In Newfoundland, that single parent could not earn more than about $9,000 net; in Quebec, $12, 500; in Saskatchewan, $20,000 (gross). Some municipalities in Ontario do approach the federal guidelines. In those cities a single parent with income less than $23,500 would qualify. (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, Tables 1-2, pp. 3-6.)

Provinces also vary in the way their day care subsidy relates to the price of care. In half of the provinces the full subsidy is equal to the day care fee. In four provinces the full subsidy may be considerably less than the fee. The authors of Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada estimated that on average parents in Quebec who are fully subsidized have to pay an additional $835 a year for centre care; those in Saskatchewan, $1,144; and those in B.C., $976. (Table 5, p. 12).

The authors of the background document also tried to judge the effectiveness of the provincial subsidy systems. One of their most important findings was that there are very little data on which to make any determination:

... information necessary to make good and detailed judgments is not collected. For instance, we cannot answer the most basic question: How many children of what ages, and family types, in what income brackets receive full and partial day care subsidy in each province and territory?

...

Similarly there is little information/studies on whether and by how much day care subsidies have allowed women to stay in the labour force or in training during their children's early years and what impact this has had on family functioning and family income levels both immediate and longer run. Equally, there is a lack of information about the specific objectives of the provincial and territorial day care subsidy systems. (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, p. 13)

(We have learned that Ontario has just recently completed a study on who receives subsidy in that province.)

However, on the basis of the available information the authors came to at least one rather startling conclusion: Across the country approximately 5% of preschool children of working parents are fully subsidized, with slight variations from province to province. In terms of the provinces' own income guidelines, 29% of the children who are eligible for subsidy actually receive it. (Provincial Day Care Subsidy Systems in Canada, p. 15, and Table 7, p. 16)

D. The CAP Day Care Subsidy/The Federal Government's Child Care Proposals

Chapter I pointed out that there are a number of provinces whose day care programs extend beyond a subsidy to low-income parents. These provinces give direct grants to services which are not dependent on the income of the users. If these grants cover operating costs, (salary enhancement grants, for example, or general operating subsidies) some, but not all, of the expenditure can be shared through CAP. Grants for start-up and capital costs cannot be shared at all. The federal proposal is far more flexible, and would allow the federal government to share in the total cost of additional funding initiatives.

The federal proposal would eliminate the distinction between for-profit and non-profit services, which eases the burden for most provinces. The proposal would also allow for a greater than 50%-50% cost-sharing in the case of some provinces. Of course, the federal proposal does not retain the open-endedness of CAP.

APPENDIX II

Implementing the National Strategy -
The Legislative Process

A. The Legislation

According to the National Strategy the forthcoming Canada Child Care Act "will establish a new legislative framework for treating child care as a basic social and economic priority (p. 4)". Clearly the Act will contain funding provisions. Like the Canada Assistance Plan the Act will enable the federal government to make cost-sharing agreements with each province. As well, the Act will probably set out the kinds of expenditures which the federal government agrees to share. We know from the National Strategy that these will include expenditures for direct capital and operating grants to services.

We would also expect the legislation to describe the objectives which the funding arrangements are designed to support. However, we do not see the objectives of a new child care act playing the role of the "criteria" and "conditions" in the Canada Health Act.

Section 4 of the Canada Health Act states that the purpose of the Act is to establish criteria and conditions which provincial programs must meet before payments flow to the provinces under funding arrangements set out in separate legislation. The criteria include public administration, comprehensiveness (provincial programs must insure all medically necessary hospital and physicians' services), universality, portability and accessibility. The conditions relate to user fees and extra-billing.

It has been possible to formulate these criteria because provincial health care programs have all reached a certain state of development, which the Act is designed to preserve. This is not true of child care services. In the body of our Report we explain why it may be necessary to come to different arrangements with each province, with respect to the implementation of standards, for example, or the rate at which spaces are developed.

Thus the arrangements which the federal government makes with the provinces may be as important as the legislation itself. We hope that these arrangements will be made public. We also ask whether the data will be available to allow an evaluation of the programs once they have run their course.

B. The Legislative Process

In order for legislation to be passed by the House of Commons it must receive three readings. After receiving leave of the House to be introduced, the legislation is given First Reading, printed and put on the list of government business for the current Parliamentary session. There is no fixed time period between First and Second Reading; it is in the government's discretion to decide when Second Reading takes place. Second Reading is a debate to accept the legislation in principle. The legislation is then sent to a Parliamentary committee for examination. The committee can direct its own procedure: for example, decide whether to hear witnesses, how many witnesses, and so on. It can also amend the legislation, although not in any way as to change it in principle. After the committee has completed its deliberations, it orders that the legislation, together with any amendments, be reported back to the House. Report Stage and Third Reading follow.

At the report stage, the House will consider motions to amend the legislation, although only upon notice in writing. Third Reading provides yet another opportunity for debate and amendment. If no amendments have been submitted for consideration, the report stage becomes more of a formality and the report and third reading stages may then occur on the same day. In voting on Third Reading, the House passes the legislation. A message is then sent to the Senate stating that the legislation has been passed.

Passage through the Senate involves a similar procedure. The Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will be responsible for examining the proposed Child Care Act.

Federal arrangements with the provinces do not have to be approved by Parliament, nor do they have to be made public.

CANADIAN MULTICULTURALISM BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-93, for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Marshall, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

ABORIGINAL DELEGATION FROM NORWAY

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce two ladies who have come to visit us from northern Norway. They have been heavily involved in dialogues between the Norwegian government and the aboriginal people and they have been very successful in achieving recognition for the aboriginal people in Norway. Moreover, the Norwegian government is, I believe, considered a leader in working towards establishing co-existence with and recognition of its aboriginal people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

LATIN AMERICAN PARLIAMENTARY MEETING ON ENERGY AND PETROLEUM

SECOND ANNUAL MEETING, BOGOTA, COLOMBIA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, July 19, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Second Annual Latin American Parliamentary Meeting on Energy and Petroleum held in Bogota, Colombia, from July 3 to 10, 1988, and the participation of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have been recent reports that representatives of Canadians of Japanese descent have been meeting with government officials with respect to reopening negotiations respecting compensation and an apology to Canadians of Japanese descent for acts taken by the government during the Second World War and following.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether there has been any progress with respect to those talks or give us any new information that he may have on these discussions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, all I can tell my friend is that my colleague, Mr. Weiner, the Minister of State (Multiculturalism), has met with representatives of the Japanese community. They are, on both sides, sufficiently satisfied that progress is being made to have decided to meet again soon.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER AND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER—GOVERNMENT ACTION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL DOCUMENTS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that flows from a question I asked on June 7 respecting the resignation of Mr. Rhéal LeBlanc, Commissioner, Correctional Service of Canada.

At that time, when I asked for an explanation, the honourable leader replied to me:

I have no reason to believe that the resignation of the commissioner, which I knew about before it was drawn to my attention by Senator Hastings, was anything but normal. It was done in the normal course and for normal reasons.

There is now evidence coming to light that there were practices and procedures by the commissioner's office that were far from normal. A report prepared by the Comptroller General of Canada with respect to the investigation of these procedures led to the conclusion that the commissioner and officials may have been in a conflict position. I do not think there was anything "normal" about the commissioner's resignation.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate the following: Did the government ask for and receive the resignation of Mr. Rhéal LeBlanc, Commissioner, and Mr. Gordon Pinder, Deputy Commissioner, Offender Policy and Program Development?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my information about Mr. LeBlanc is that he received an attractive offer from the Government of Alberta and decided to accept it. I have no information about Mr. Pinder, but I shall make inquiries along the line suggested by the honourable senator.

Senator Hastings: Would the Leader of the Government undertake to table in this chamber all documentation prepared by the Comptroller General with respect to his investigation into the practices of the commissioner's office and his contracting procedures with CACI Canada Limited of Edmonton, wherein over $600,000 in contracts were leased to one organization on a sole-purpose basis?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has correctly identified the Comptroller General of Canada as having conducted an investigation into this matter at the request of the Solicitor General in October of 1987.

I have to tell the honourable senator that my information is that that study has been released in its entirety, except for certain legally required exceptions relating to privacy and third-party information, which are provided for in the Access to Information Act.

Senator Hastings: Would the Leader of the Government undertake to table that study in the Senate or at least make it available to honourable senators?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall make available to my honourable friend the document to which I have referred.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—MAINTENANCE AND USE OF FACILITIES

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is with reference to the Port of Churchill. Mr. Jarvis, who is a member of the Wheat Board in Winnipeg, mentioned yesterday that the possibility that Churchill will receive any grain this year is poor. I understand that the CNR is preparing the tracks to go to Churchill, whether they are going to use the port or not, and I also understand that there are approximately 10,000 tonnes of grain in storage in Churchill at the moment. If there is no grain to be shipped there at all, that will create a hardship not only for the port itself but for the people of the area.

I personally believe that to bring Churchill into the Canadian port picture, as it should be, we need some strong political will and support so that we will also have products other than grain being shipped from and received at the Port of Churchill. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate take that into consideration so that the government will help Churchill once and for all, instead of saying that it is supporting Churchill, but only when the grain is delivered? If the government would do that, we could be assured that regular employment would take place in Churchill and also that the people of Manitoba would benefit—not just the farmers who can ship grain through to Churchill in an advantageous way, particularly the farmers from Saskatchewan.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend is aware that, in terms of the total shipments of grain through Canadian ports, Churchill has had a relatively small proportion. In any case, the honourable senator need not have any fears about the extent of political support of the present government for the Port of Churchill and the use of that port. If there is further information that I can convey to the Senate, I will obtain it, in particular, from my colleague, Mr. Mayer.

AGRICULTURE

PLIGHT OF TOBACCO FARMERS IN SOUTH-WESTERN ONTARIO— AGENDA ITEM AT MEETING OF MINISTERS OF AGRICULTURE— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This week the federal and provincial Ministers of Agriculture met in Toronto. Could the Leader of the Government advise us whether the problems facing the tobacco farmers in south-western Ontario constituted a specific item on the agenda? If so, will anything be coming forward as a result of the meeting that has taken place this week?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall have to ask for a report from my colleague, Mr. Wise, the Minister of Agriculture.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

SERVICES AND RECOGNITION OF RIGHTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY—ROLE OF PROVINCES

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that has to do with aboriginal peoples in Canada. Knowing that the Conservative government up to now—to my best recollection, at least—has no specific policy in terms of the types of services or the recognition of rights that should be in place for the aboriginal peoples, will that government, before the election, be coming out with a policy with regard to aboriginal peoples? If so, will that policy become public information?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess—and perhaps it is because of our respective locations in the chamber—that I did not understand fully the import of the honourable senator's question. I will have to read it in Hansard and bring in a prepared reply. In the preamble to the question there were a number of what appeared to me to be assertions that I could not accept and I would want to consider them very carefully.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, let me try again to see whether I can make my question a little clearer.

It is quite well known within the aboriginal society that the present government has no policy for aboriginal peoples. My question is this: Will the government come out with such a policy before the election? If so, will that become public information?

Senator Murray: Well, what I thought I heard the first time was, indeed, what I heard. Honourable senators, I reject absolutely the contention of the honourable senator that this government does not have a policy with regard to aboriginal peoples. Senator Watt has only to go back to the many efforts that were made to obtain for aboriginal peoples a self-government amendment to our Constitution. He has only to refer to the proposals that we put on the table before the provinces and the representatives of the aboriginal peoples at the constitutional conferences. He may also wish to consider the efforts that we have made in tripartite negotiations between certain of our aboriginal peoples, the provincial governments and the federal government, the progress that we have tried to make and the proposals we have tried to put forward with regard to land claim settlements and so forth. Therefore, the premise of his question is completely invalid.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I do appreciate the fact that the present government made some efforts and tried to reach some tangible agreement at the constitutional level. That, however, is not the only area that has to be taken into consideration. The transfer of administrative responsibilities takes place almost daily between the federal and the provincial governments. Those governments that are beginning to assume responsibilities have very little knowledge of the real requirements of aboriginal peoples in the various regions, particularly in some of the isolated communities. Before the Government of Canada completely transfers its administrative responsibilities, it should carefully examine the jurisdictional questions that are associated with that.

Do not forget that the Government of Canada, according to the Constitution of this country, has a trusteeship responsibility under section 91.24, which cannot be taken lightly. It is a part of the Constitution.

As I have said, I do appreciate the effort that your people have made with regard to the constitutional level, and that has to continue. There is also the other side of it, the "service" side, which ties the two together. The Government of Canada, from time to time, says, "Our pockets are empty. You have to turn to the provinces." The provinces then say, "We have not been provided with financial aid by the federal government. We cannot entertain your request."

A solution has to be found.

I believe that the Government of Canada is moving too fast in willingly relinquishing its responsibility to the provinces. I would like to alert you to that, because it is going to become a real problem in the near future. That is why I am raising the point that the government has to have a policy. If it does not have a policy, then things will slip into the hands of the provinces, which the aboriginal peoples have rejected from day one.

I go back to the time when the white paper was introduced by the previous government—the Liberal government. The policies contained in that white paper are gradually being introduced. In the eyes of the aboriginal peoples, some of those policies are already in practice.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not wish to enter into a debate on this matter during Question Period. However, there are three points that should be made.

First, the federal government has no intention whatsoever of abdicating any part of the constitutional responsibility that devolves upon it for Indians and lands reserved for Indians. Second, in terms of any administrative arrangements, we make them in the closest consultation with those affected. Third, I understand the point that the honourable senator makes about the role of the provinces. Nevertheless, the country is divided into provinces. The aboriginal peoples do live within provincial boundaries. It cannot be said that the provinces can wash their hands of any responsibility for services to these people.

Having said that, I repeat that the federal government does not contemplate abdicating any of the responsibilities that devolve upon it with respect to aboriginal peoples.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PRESIDENCY—APPOINTMENT TO FILL VACANCY—NAME OF CONSULTING FIRM

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate enlighten us as to the vacancy of the presidency in the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

Several weeks ago the minister, in response to a question, said that the appointment was imminent. Several weeks have since passed. As the minister knows, the previous president was fired on October 3 by the government. There have been indications that a search committee has been established by the board of directors. Can the minister enlighten us any further as to an appointment?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know what is holding this matter up. I thought it was imminent when I gave that answer to my honourable friend some weeks ago. It turns out that it was not imminent then, but pending. When I asked yesterday, I was told that it is imminent.

I will make further inquiries, but, again, I have no reason to believe that the appointment will be long delayed.

Senator Graham: The Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion indicated that an outside, independent consulting firm had been employed to make a recommendation. Could the minister reveal to us the name of the consulting firm that is making that recommendation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know that.

Senator Graham: Would the minister be good enough to inquire and provide us with that answer?

• (1420)

Senator Murray: I shall see what information I can obtain and properly convey to the house on that matter.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers. According to the established practice, unless otherwise requested, I ask that they be taken as read and that they appear in Debates of the Senate.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 15 last, by the Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein, regarding Human Rights—Japanese Canadians—Government Apology and Compensation.

(The answer follows:)

On June 15, the Honourable Gerry Weiner met with representatives of the Japanese Canadian community to discuss the redress issue. There was a general consensus that those involved are acting in good faith and want to resolve the matter in a timely way. Both the minister and the group's representatives agreed to examine certain possibilities and meet again soon.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—STATUS OF CN RAIL SYSTEM—PROSPECTIVE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 21 last, by the Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding Transport—Prince Edward Island—Status of CN Rail System—Prospective Federal-Provincial Agreement

(The answer follows:)

The railroad in Prince Edward Island has not been abandoned, although I am aware that this has been proposed in some quarters.

The federal government has ongoing discussions with Prince Edward Island relating to its transportation services in accordance with the needs of Prince Edward Island.

The federal government's transportation programs and its cooperation with the provinces on the details of implementation necessarily vary according to the specific needs of each province and region of the country: the type of service and arrangements that meet the needs of one province may not be suitable for the different needs of another province.

Contrary to Senator Bonnell's assertion, our Constitution does not restrict the federal and provincial governments by requiring that any arrangement suitable for one province must be imposed on or granted to every province.

CANADIAN MULTICULTURALISM BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-93, An Act for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like this order to stand until later this day, please.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands until later this day.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REVISED MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—
MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1(b), 3, 4, 9(a) and 11 to the Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1(a), 2, 5, 6(a), 7, 8, 9(b) and (c), 10, 12(a) and (b);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 14, 18 and 29;

That the Senate agree to the further amendment made by that House, adding a new clause after line 31 on page 56; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, may this matter stand until later this day?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands until later this day.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eileen Rossiter moved the third reading of Bill C-111, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to repeal certain enactments in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-89, to amend the Criminal Code (victims of crime).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, as I observed on second reading of Bill C-89, most of us in this chamber would agree on the need for measures to assist victims of crime, to offer them greater support, compensation and restitution by the offender in appropriate cases and to recognize their place in the criminal process. Keeping those objectives in mind, the committee was also concerned that the bill preserve the fundamental rights and freedoms that are the basis of our criminal justice system and the Charter, including the rights of accused persons.

The committee heard a number of witnesses in its review of the legislation: criminal lawyers from the defence bar; professors of criminology with particular expertise on the concerns of victims; spokespeople for victim assistance groups and the chairman of the Law Reform Commission. We also heard from the Minister of Justice and from his officials on several occasions. We are grateful for their careful consideration of our comments and questions during our examination of the bill.

One of our principal concerns was with the extension of the mandatory ban on publication of the identity of complainants to proceedings relating to the offences of loan sharking and extortion. Bill C-89 also provides that, if the prosecutor, the complainant or a witness under 18 asks for a ban on the publication of information disclosing the identity of the complainant or witness, the judge must grant the request.

We do not disagree with protecting complainants and witnesses in appropriate cases but feel that giving judges discretion to limit publicity would be the better course of action. As a matter of principle, the committee believes that bans on publication in criminal cases should be made by the courts on a case-by-case basis. We recognize the need for a mandatory ban in exceptional cases. This is why we agreed to the provision in relation to sexual offences against children. However, a mandatory ban is a drastic curtailment of freedom of the press and should be used sparingly. In spite of the arguments advanced by the minister and his officials, some committee members are still not convinced that extortion and loan sharking are offences for which the exception should be made.

The government will soon be given two opportunities to review its position in this matter. An appeal has recently been heard in the Supreme Court of Canada in Canadian Newspaper Co. Ltd. vs the Attorney-General for Canada against a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal, which held that the mandatory ban contained in section 442(3) of the Criminal Code was of no force and effect because it infringed the freedom of the press, contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Furthermore, the Department of Justice is examining the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission which have been advanced as part of the process of developing a new Criminal Code. On the question of publication bans, the commission is of the view that in all cases the presumption should be in favour of openness and that no automatic bans should remain in the Code.

Because we shall shortly be given a final opinion on this aspect of the present law, the committee has decided not to pursue the matter further at this time.

The other provisions of the bill that caused considerable concern were those which would allow for the imprisonment of offenders who default on payment of restitution orders, with no appeal from the proceedings at which the finding is made. We are aware that imprisonment is not automatic, that a hearing is held and that reasons for failing to pay will be assessed. However, imprisonment is a harsh sanction, whether it serves as a punishment or, as in the case of Bill C-89, the threat of its imposition is designed as a goad to the payment of money to the victim of a crime. Therefore, offenders should not be sent to jail without all the safeguards the criminal justice system can provide.

• (1430)

Apart from the possible violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in imposing imprisonment without appeal for what some committee members believe is a fresh offence, we also have doubts about both the efficacy and appropriateness of imprisonment as a means of enforcing the payment of restitution. Attempts to enforce payment of what may be a relatively small sum in restitution could result in significant costs to the state—the expense of imprisonment and perhaps welfare payments to the offender's family.

Personally, I believe that Canada has far too many people using up far too much expensive and useless time in jail because they cannot pay a fine. A recent report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission states that in 1983 fine defaulters made up 14 per cent of the prison population in British Columbia, 32 per cent in Ontario and 48 per cent in Quebec. The report also indicated that there is a wide disparity in the length of the prison sentences served by offenders in default of fines.

In response to our concerns, government officials stated that imprisonment in default of payment of restitution is not intended to apply to offenders who cannot pay. Rather, it is an enforcement method of last resort. In spite of the strong arguments we heard and assurances of the existence of safeguards with respect to these particular provisions, our misgivings remain. As stated in the committee's report, the existence of other safeguards, including judicial review, is significant, but an appeal mechanism would have been preferable.

Over the past few years Parliament has passed many bills that have brought significant changes to the criminal law. Here we are passing a statute to expand the use of restitution orders, to impose victim fine surcharges and to set procedures for the use of victim impact statements, to name only a few measures in the bill. If widely used, such provisions may, and undoubtedly will, have a major impact. Therefore, it is important to know what actually happens as a result. Will social benefits result or will the problems remain? We have recently made changes to the young offenders legislation and to sexual offence provisions in the Criminal Code. Shortly we shall be asked to authorize seizure and forfeiture of proceeds of crime. It is very important that we keep track of the effect of all these changes. Surely today modern technology would seem to offer ways of recording any type of information required and of analyzing it, no matter how voluminous or complex.

[Senator Neiman.]

While the committee was studying the legislation, which I have mentioned, I, as chairman, on several occasions asked the Department of Justice if it had put in or intended to put in a regime to analyze the effects of these various changes to the Criminal Code and other acts. Unfortunately, we have continued to receive the reply that the matter is under consideration and under study. In this day and age, when we are constantly creating new types of criminal offences, I really do not feel that that is good enough.

Therefore, the committee recommended most strongly to the government—and I repeat it—that it take immediate action, in conjunction with provincial and territorial authorities, to put in place a system of data gathering to provide meaningful statistics on the impact of changes to the criminal justice system.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Spivak, for the second reading of the Bill C-61, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Nurgitz did an excellent job in moving second reading of Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. He also did an excellent job in explaining the purpose and content of the bill.

I am happy to be able to say that I believe my colleagues in the official opposition will be able to support not only the purpose of this legislation but also, after careful scrutiny in committee, the manner in which the bill implements this purpose.

It, perhaps, logically falls to a Liberal senator to point out that this bill results from the efforts of the task force set up within the Government of Canada by a Liberal minister of justice in the early 1980s. I notice that our colleagues on the government benches always seem to be willing to point out, even at this late date, what they consider to be shortcomings of former Liberal administrations, but, mysteriously, their memories fail when it comes to giving credit.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Stanbury: In any event, I am prepared today to congratulate Senator Nurgitz and the government he represents for finally having acted upon the recommendations of that task force and presenting to honourable senators a bill that can only enhance the public's respect for law and justice and take away from organized crime one of its most important tools, the ability to launder and invest the proceeds of crime domestically or globally with impunity. I remember that four years ago, at the Conference of the Canada-U.S. Interparliamentary Group, one of the burning issues was the high-handed way in which the courts in the State of Florida had held to ransom a local branch of one of Canada's chartered banks until it had agreed to make available to the court information concerning substantial financial transactions which had taken place in an offshore branch of that bank. I can remember complaining bitterly that the State of Florida had not respected due process of law. A response from an American congressman was that until Canadian law provided some remedies for the easy laundering of drug money through Canadian banks' overseas branches the American courts might well be expected, through frustration, to take what might be deemed to be unusual, but perhaps justified, measures.

● (1440)

We are at last fulfilling our international obligations. It is true that this bill somewhat anticipates wide acceptance of an international accord, but it is still pretty late, having in mind the course of events in the drug trade over the last number of years.

The provisions of the bill are most important. The police forces will now have the means to trace and seize the proceeds of crime as never before. At the same time this bill attempts to guard against breaches of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to see that the rights of privacy are preserved and that the rights of innocent third parties are protected, so far as possible within the purpose of the legislation.

The legislation is aimed at the greedy. The bill calls their activities "enterprise crime". They are not just drug smugglers and dealers. The term is intended to cover all organizations that take advantage of modern communications, transportation and corporate structuring to frustrate the legal systems of our country and of other countries around the world, to obfuscate the source and diversion of vast illicit wealth.

During committee hearings in the other place a number of useful amendments were introduced that have made the bill even more effective than its original draft. Our committee may wish to make further amendments. In any event, I should like to see the matter go forward as quickly as possible. Its passage may help to encourage the final acceptance of the United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances.

Honourable senators, I recommend that we give this bill second reading and leave its detailed discussion to our Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, for the second reading of the Bill C-124, An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, all Canadians are painfully aware of the very high number of industrial accidents and even deaths that occur in the workplaces of this country annually. The situation of workers in many industrial settings in which health and safety issues are crucial must be the subject of constant attention and revision.

As Senator Spivak told us yesterday in her analysis of this bill, the series of amendments to the Canada Labour Code contained in Bill C-124 will provide improvements for those working in Canada's coal mines. This set of amendments represents an improvement upon existing legislation, and we are in support of speedy passage of this bill.

It is not necessary for me to add to the analysis given by Senator Spivak, but I would like to add a comment on the very satisfactory process through which agreement on these amendments has been reached among all parties. Our critic in the other place, the member of Parliament for Cape Breton-East Richmond, has expressed great satisfaction that the consultations were widespread and extensive with the unions, the employers and the critics in the other place, and that he himself was able to play a constructive role in bringing about and helping these consultations. He also expressed the view that the minister did an excellent job in bringing these amendments forward in a quick and satisfactory fashion. Indeed, he asked me to make that statement as part of my remarks this afternoon, and I am pleased to do so. This is one of those occasions on which we can look with satisfaction on the cooperative and positive role played by the government and its critics in bringing about direct improvements in the lives of Canadians working in so many dangerous occupations, represented in this case by work in coal mines.

I suggest that we give second reading to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Spivak, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OFFSHORE PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cochrane, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, for the second reading of the Bill C-75, An Act to implement an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia on offshore petroleum resource management and revenue sharing and to make related and consequential amendments.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I regret that I was not present yesterday to hear the address on second reading given by Senator Cochrane, who came to the rescue of her neighbouring province by launching the debate on this offshore agreement. I must thank her for her presentation, although I regret she relied so heavily on some of the puff pieces that were obviously put together by overenthusiastic departmental writers. Nevertheless, I appreciate her activity in the interests of Nova Scotia and Canada.

We have no difficulty with this bill. We intend to give it the normal treatment. Accordingly, it should receive Royal Assent much earlier than the legislative priority which the government attached to it would suggest. It is clear that it is a bill and a subject matter which did not receive much priority from the government.

As has already been stated, Bill C-75 implements the agreement finalized between Canada and Nova Scotia on August 26, 1986. With luck, it might become law two years later or two years and a bit better later. One might have thought, in view of the fanfare which accompanied the signing of this agreement, that it should have received greater priority. The fact is that Bill C-75 was not introduced in the House of Commons for first reading until June 26, 1987, a full ten months after the agreement was signed.

● (1450)

As with the Atlantic Accord bill, about which I spoke on a previous occasion, the government did not press ahead either with the introduction of the legislation or with its passage through Parliament. As I stated earlier, it has been almost two years since that agreement was signed.

We intend to support Bill C-75, and, as a Nova Scotian, I particularly support the idea of a moratorium on drilling on the Georges Bank. The Georges Bank, as we all know, is an important and vital wealth-producing area of Nova Scotia, and it did finally receive the treatment it deserved by an amendment which was introduced to the original bill.

The people of the province of Nova Scotia, and in particular the fishermen of southwest Nova Scotia, welcome the decision to ban drilling on the Bank until at least the year 2000. Having said that, I would hasten to add that it was really the people of Nova Scotia and the public opinion of the province that finally induced the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia to accept the notion that drilling on the Georges Bank ought to be delayed.

Senator Cochrane talked about the era of cooperation which had been ushered in by the election of the new government in 1984. I should have thought that that rhetoric was somewhat outdated in July 1988—in the reality of the experience since 1984—because it is a fact that, when the moratorium on the Georges Bank was announced, the Premier of Nova Scotia publicly stated that day that he had had absolutely no advance warning whatsoever of the decision of the Government of Canada to declare a moratorium and that he would check into it and find out what had been going on. At least he was reported in the Halifax newspapers to that effect.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources took a more realistic attitude than did Senator Cochrane in her address on this subject when he said:

The people of Nova Scotia have decided on a moratorium until the year 2000. The people of Nova Scotia have said that they fear the environmental impact on Georges Bank.

It was, of course, the public opinion of Nova Scotia that eventually brought about the amendment to the original bill.

We acknowledge the importance of the fishery in the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly the fact that that industry is a mainstay in the economy of the southwestern part of the province. Nevertheless, the concern about drilling on the Georges Bank was not a negative attitude towards industrial development by the citizens of the province; they are quite prepared to accept economic change and industrial diversification.

There are just one or two points I should like to raise in connection with the contents of the bill, and possibly the sponsoring senator can give me some information on these matters when she concludes the debate or when, indeed, the bill comes back from committee and we give it third reading. For instance, we are interested in the board that is to be established. We know that it is to consist of five members, two chosen by the federal government, two chosen by the province, with the fifth member to be chosen jointly. We do not know what the precise activities of the board will be nor do we have any idea of what the proposed budget of this particular board is to be.

In his testimony before the House of Commons legislative committee on June 7, 1988, the minister was non-committal and vague on the subject of the activities and budget of the board. Perhaps, now that the matter has been brought to his attention, that information can be forthcoming and made available to the public prior to the enactment of the legislation.

One wonders whether any progress has been made whatsoever in establishing the board and whether it has been held up because of the delay in bringing forward the legislation. That is one point.

The second point has to do with the $200 million fund provided under this particular agreement. As we know, there was an original agreement entered into by the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada in 1982. That agreement was at that time satisfactory to the Province of Nova Scotia and to the premier of the province. However, a new agreement was entered into, and the original fund, which had some conditions attached to it, has been transformed into an outright grant system. One is bound to ask at this stage what has happened, if anything, to the $200 million fund. Have items been approved for expenditure? Have commitments been made? Have, indeed, any expenditures been made? Perhaps that information can be forthcoming before we conclude our business.

It has been reported that funds have been committed to such projects as bridges, roads, hospitals, ferries, operating expenses for provincial government departments and even sewers for a private real estate development. It would be interesting to have these rumours scotched, because it rather stretches the imagination to envisage that a fund established under an offshore agreement between Nova Scotia and Canada, created for the development of the offshore, could be used for projects that seem rather remote from offshore development. Perhaps on this point we could be given some information.

It is clear that the original intention of the fund was to provide for capital spending related to anticipated offshore development. Therefore, it becomes relevant now to inquire what commitments and what expenditures have been made—and for what purposes.

I read earlier in the year that the Auditor General of Canada was conducting a comprehensive audit on this matter. Of course, we await the results with interest.

As we examine the third reading speeches in the House of Commons, we acknowledge that all parties agreed with the final passage of the bill and that all speakers were principally preoccupied with the Georges Bank drilling ban. In the concentration on that particular and important problem, relatively little attention was paid to one of the major, stated objectives of the agreement when it was signed in August 1986, which was:

● (1500)

to achieve the early development of petroleum resources in the offshore area for the benefit of Canada as a whole and Nova Scotia in particular.

One can certainly say at this stage that early development of petroleum resources has not yet occurred and that certainly that objective has not been attained.

The 1987 annual report of the Canadian Petroleum Association provides a succinct statement of what to expect:

Things will be quiet in 1988 on the east coast, with only two or three new wells scheduled at this time.

Petro-Canada, one of the major players in the frontiers, states in its 1987 Annual Report as follows:

In 1987, the Corporation reduced frontier land expenditures. Only those frontier holdings containing significant discoveries or possessing definite medium-term exploration potential were retained. As a consequence exploration rights were relinquished in large areas off the East Coast and in the North.

During the year, Petro-Canada increased its emphasis on international programs.

That is a quotation from the annual report.

The activity and the presence of Petro-Canada has been drastically reduced on the east coast and its interest in international activity has increased. Certainly, that is not in accordance with the stated objective of the offshore agreement, which was to achieve offshore development. I recall that a drilling operation that Petro-Canada had commenced in the off-shore of eastern Nova Scotia was transferred to Africa and the equipment was situated in Ghana.

It is important to put this situation in perspective. There is very little activity off the coast of Nova Scotia at the present time. There has been a drastic diminution in offshore drilling activity. In 1984 14 drill rigs were active in the east coast offshore area and $1.3 billion was invested that year in the search for hydrocarbons. In the spring of 1984 up to nine rigs were working off the Scotia shelf near Sable Island.

The most recent issue of the "Canadian Petroleum Association Review" states that in the month of May only three drill rigs were operating in the east coast offshore; there were fourteen rigs in 1984 and three in 1988. The point is clearly made by the statistics that the offshore agreement has had virtually no impact on activity. The fact is, while there may have been, in the words of the sponsoring senator, an increase in that intangible federal-provincial cooperation, there has been a decrease in the tangibles, namely, production and development.

I have on a previous occasion gone into this whole question in some detail and I would not want to repeat all the arguments I made at that time about the circumstances which have had the effect of reducing to a virtual standstill offshore activity in Nova Scotia. Of course, the situation has been due in part to the decrease in international oil prices and in part to the withdrawal of the government from activity, and to the lack of any policy on the part of the Government of Canada that would maintain offshore development.

The agreement to which we are now giving belated approval has had absolutely no effect up to the present in achieving what was regarded as a fundamental objective, namely, the offshore development of the province of Nova Scotia. Obviously we will hear some answers, particularly on the fund and on the board, either in committee or later at third reading.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cochrane, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

PRIVATE BILL

MONTREAL TRUST COMPANY OF CANADA—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to return Bill S-17, intituled, An Act to authorize the Montreal Trust Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec, and to acquaint the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons which reads as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
Canada

Tuesday, July 12, 1988

ORDERED—That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendment 1 made by the Senate to Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, but disagrees with amendments 2(a) and (b) and with the earlier amendments 5(b) and (c), on which the Senate insists, because this House believes they contradict the principles of the Bill for the following reasons:

Amendments 2(a) and (b) would reverse the policy on which the Immigration Act, 1976 was based, which policy was not changed in the Bill as passed by this House. The amendments jeopardize the possibility of successfully prosecuting persons who profit from organizing illegal migration and from counselling fraud among refugee claimants.

Earlier amendments 5(b) and (c) arise out of Senate amendment 5(a), which is amended by this House, and are inconsistent with that amendment.

And, that this House agrees with the principles set out in amendment 3 and in earlier amendment 5(a) on which the Senate insists, but would propose the following amendments:

Amendment 3 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 14 to 16 on page 24, and substitute the following:

"referred to in paragraphs 19(1)(e), 2(a) and 48.1(c) and subsections 39(2), 40(1), 41(1), 82.1(2), 83(1) and 91.1(1) and any such power,"

Earlier amendment 5(a) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 13 to 30 on page 8, and substitute the following:

91.1(1) Subject to subsection (1.1), where the Minister believes on reasonable grounds that a vehicle within twelve nautical miles of the outer limit of the territorial sea of Canada is bringing any person into Canada in contravention of this Act or the regulations, the Minister may direct the vehicle not to enter the internal waters of Canada or the territorial sea of Canada, as the case may be, and any such direction may be enforced by such force as is reasonable in the circumstances.

(1.1) The Minister may make a direction under subsection (1) where the Minister is satisfied that

(a) the vehicle can return to its port of embarkation without endangering the lives of its passengers;

(b) all passengers who seek Convention refugee status and are nationals or citizens of the country where the vehicle embarked them have been removed from the vehicle and brought into Canada;

(c) the country where the vehicle embarked its passengers is a signatory to the Convention and complies with Article 33 thereof; and

(d) the country would allow the passengers to return to that country or to have the merits of their claims to Convention refugee status determined therein.

(1.2) Where the Minister believes on reasonable grounds that a vehicle within (a) the internal waters of Canada, or (b) the territorial sea of Canada is bringing any person into Canada in contravention of this Act or the regulations, the Minister may direct that the vehicle be escorted to the nearest port of disembarkation and any such direction may be enforced by such force as is reasonably necessary."

and

That Bill C-84 be further amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 17 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"portation by sea.

(4) If, during the second session of the thirty-third Parliament, Bill C-55 entitled An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof is assented to, this section shall cease to be in force six months after the day on which that Act comes into force."

ATTEST

ROBERT MARLEAU
The Clerk of the House of Commons

[English]

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Marshall:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendment 3 and earlier amendment 5 (a) to the Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 2 (a) and (b) and earlier amendments 5 (b) and (c);

That the Senate agree to the further amendment made by that House to clause 8; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

If there are no objections, honourable senators, I would have that motion stand in my name until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

MUTUAL LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN CRIMINAL MATTERS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Baroote, for the second reading of Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976.—(Hon. Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would first of all like to congratulate Senator Ottenheimer for his clear enough explanation of the provisions and international dimensions of this bill.

● (1510)

[English]

For the historical and the legislative context of this bill I ask honourable senators to cast their minds back some years to March 18, 1985, when Irish eyes were smiling in Quebec City at the famous—or, depending on your point of view, infamous—Shamrock Summit.

Senator Nurgitz: You didn't get invited, either!

Senator Frith: That is right, neither I nor the Governor General were booked for that particular gig.

As I say, I do not think we could agree unanimously that it was "famous" or "infamous", but, as far as we are concerned, one of the infamous corollaries to that summit meeting is presently before a legislative committee of the other place, which will be reporting it, we are told, on August 10 next. As I have explained, honourable senators, this legislation is a product of the summit meeting between the President of the United States and Prime Minister Mulroney, but I am bound to say that there are, nevertheless, reasons to support this legislation.

As honourable senators will know from speeches made in the other place and from the explanation given by Senator

Ottenheimer, this bill intends to set out the legal framework necessary to implement in Canada the provisions of the Canada-U.S. Treaty on Mutual Legal Assistance. It is, therefore, what is generally called "implementing legislation", as is the legislation dealing with the Free Trade Agreement.

Traditionally, in criminal matters international cooperation has taken various forms—extradition, commissioned evidence, the service of documents issued by a foreign court and informal cooperation between law enforcement agencies, to name four examples. With an increase in transnational crime as a result of technological advancement in communications and transportation, crime is no longer a local or national affair. To quote the minister, "criminals take advantage of the traditional notion of territorial jurisdiction to escape prosecution." We must recognize mutual legal assistance as a tool that is both modern and essential to fight against international crime.

The treaty, which this legislation implements, encompasses both non-compulsory and compulsory means of assistance. Bill C-58 applies to the compulsory means of assistance, of which there are four categories: search warrants; the summoning of witnesses; the temporary transfer of persons in custody and the lending of Canadian exhibits to a foreign state.

Honourable senators, we support this bill, but there is a feeling in some quarters that the bill is a public relations exercise on the part of the government, because most, if not all, of the measures for which this bill provides legislation are already in practice, in diverse ways, at national common and civil law levels. In view of that uncertainty, perhaps the committee can look into it and assure us otherwise. Obviously any measure that assists law enforcement in the war against crime—especially organized or large-scale crime rings operating transnationally—should be supported by this house.

I should also like the committee to examine whether Canada is negotiating effectively with the United States in the development of a number of treaties and arrangements that have recently been signed. There have been complaints that the United States is enforcing such treaties and may enforce these provisions less enthusiastically than Canada is doing. Although I think the committee should look into those questions, it is clear that the principle of the bill should receive our support.

Honourable senators, I am not sure whether this bill should be studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs because of the treaty dimension of the legislation or by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. My suggestion to the sponsor of the bill is that, at least in the first instance, this bill go to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. It is, after all, legislation on criminal law, although I believe that the treaty implications I have raised should also be examined.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Ottenheimer, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): moved the second reading of Bill C-72, respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the Official Languages Act goes to the heart of the social contract that underlies the Canadian federation. It is the essence of our unity, our identity and our existence as a country. Without the act of 1969 and the policy it represents, I believe that we might very well have lost the country altogether or that, today, we would be the mere shell of a country—fractured, embittered and incapable of national will or national consensus.

Senator Gigantès: Who was prime minister at the time?

Senator Murray: Oh, I will come to that, honourable senators, and I have no hesitation—I never have had and I hope never will have—in giving credit where credit is due.

If I may be permitted a personal reference, when I first came to work here on the Hill 27 years ago there was a debate in the Senate whether to permit the installation of simultaneous translation facilities. That had been done in the House of Commons only two years previously. Of course, one always had the right to speak in Parliament in the official language of one's choice, but if someone were a francophone and wanted to be understood by his colleagues, or most of them, he spoke in the language of the majority. That was only 27 years ago.

• (1520)

French Canadians, looking at the Government of Canada as a whole and in its various emanations, saw very little to reflect their presence and importance in this country for many years. Whether they lived in Quebec or elsewhere, French Canadians saw that the promise of Confederation had, for them, been largely lost.

The Official Languages Act of 1969, and the policy that backed it up and that has evolved since, did not represent a new concept grafted onto the body politic of Canada. It represented our belated effort as Canadians to fulfill the concept of partnership that the Fathers of Confederation had agreed was necessary in this country, a concept which, in their time, they had implemented by creating federal institutions that were legally bilingual and by affording constitutional protection to certain linguistic guarantees.

[Translation]

Section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 did provide for the use of English and French in the debates and in the publication of the laws and other documents of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Quebec, as well as in the federal and Quebec courts.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

The granting of guarantees based on religion in Section 93 would also provide, at least for a time, for minority language education in Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba.

[English]

However, the politicians who succeeded the Fathers of Confederation, lacking the wisdom of their predecessors, failed to respect the spirit of Confederation in language matters. Despite solid constitutional guarantees for the linguistic minority in the Act of 1870, Manitoba declared itself unilingual in 1890. The same year franco-Manitobans also lost their schools and the resumption of teaching in French in 1896 was the prelude to another abolition in 1916. In 1912 Ontario's Regulation 17 put the stamp of majority and official intolerance on the issue of French schools.

So, at the provincial level outside Quebec, francophone minority rights were everywhere being diminished by the majority. At the federal level, a minimalist interpretation and application of the concept of bilingualism that had been in the Constitution was the order of the day.

It is little wonder that later steps taken by succeeding governments—bilingual postage stamps in 1927, amendments to the Civil Service Act in 1938 and 1958 to make the régime a bit more bilingual, bilingual cheques in the early 1960s—were perceived by many francophones as too little, too late. They did not succeed in creating a climate that would give the country's francophones a sense of full participation in our national institutions.

In the face of the precarious situation of francophones outside Quebec, is it any wonder that Quebecers would look increasingly toward their own province for institutions that reflected their own aspirations?

[Translation]

The Quiet Revolution in Quebec in the early 1960s would profoundly change Quebec society and give it the means to assert itself and be heard. Taking much of its strength from Quebecers' awareness of the precarious state of French in Quebec and in Canada, the Government of Quebec was able to present itself as the only body that could ensure the collective future of French-speaking Quebecers, culturally and economically.

It became urgent for francophones from Quebec and elsewhere in the country to feel more at home in federal institutions, if Confederation were to be given renewed impetus.

In attesting to the situation, the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission stated in 1965 that Canada was going through the most important crisis in its history. The commissioners added:

If (this crisis) persists and intensifies, it can lead to the destruction of Canada. If it is overcome, it will have contributed to making Canada richer and more dynamic.

[English]

Richer and more dynamic, because the Canada the commission proposed would see anglophones and francophones working together to build this country within federal institutions that reflected our linguistic duality.

In a series of six reports produced between 1967 and 1970, the commission proposed, among other things, that Canada and some of the provinces declare themselves officially bilingual. Governments were asked to contribute to the development of minority official language communities. It was recommended that the federal public service be made bilingual with respect to both language of service and language of work. It was also suggested that the principle of respect for the equality of the two languages be extended beyond government institutions to encompass private and voluntary organizations.

In short, the commission suggested the creation of a Canada in which francophones and anglophones could live together in an atmosphere of harmony and respect for one another. It proposed a Canada in which the special characteristics of each community did not serve as divisive factors but, instead, constituted the resources and the capital with which the Canada of tomorrow would be built. According to the commission, this Canada of tomorrow lay within our grasp insofar as we wanted it.

[Translation]

In the midst of this controversy and despite the passions unleashed within Canadian society, in 1969, the Government of Prime Minister Trudeau and the leaders of the other federal parties, Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Lewis and their colleagues, rose above partisanship and passed the Official Languages Act. Those who study language issues understand what composure they needed then and we still need today when dealing with these issues.

The 1969 Act made English and French the official languages of Canada. It established the equal status of English and French within the federal government and provided for services in both languages. The act also created the Office of Commissioner of Official Languages.

[English]

The same year New Brunswick declared itself officially bilingual in a resolution, if my memory serves me correctly, adopted unanimously by the New Brunswick legislature of that day under the leadership of Premier Louis Robichaud, our present colleague in the Senate. The opposition of the day was under the leadership of Mr. Richard Hatfield.

The Official Languages Act of New Brunswick is one of the key parts of a wider and richer historic legacy that has been left to the people of New Brunswick and to the people of Canada by the government of Premier Robichaud. I am very glad that Senator Robichaud is with us today, and I am glad to have the opportunity to salute his historic contribution in that regard in New Brunswick, because the Official Languages Act in that province was one of the keys to what we are talking about. It amounts to the renaissance of the Acadian people in which Senator Robichaud and some of his associates in New Brunswick played a very important part.

Senator Frith: No bones for Senate members of the B & B Commission.

• (1530)

Senator Murray: I am glad to have Senator Frith, who was a member of that commission, place it on the record.

An Hon. Senator: That's good!

Senator Murray: About the same time—that was in the late 1960s—school legislation broadened access to French-language public education in Ontario and Manitoba.

Senator Guay: Right on! He is sitting right beside you also!

Senator Murray: Senator Guay points to the presence in the chamber of our distinguished colleague, Senator Roblin, who was premier of Manitoba during much of that time.

The constitutional talks which led to the Victoria Charter promised to entrench recognition of the official status of English and French in the Constitution. However, and for reasons which had nothing to do with its linguistic provisions, the Victoria Charter never became one of our constitutional documents.

Changing attitudes and the will to achieve greater linguistic justice were nevertheless expressed in its text, which set out, among other things, constitutional guarantees for use of the two official languages in the legislatures of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. The Constitution would have recognized the right of citizens to communicate in the official language of their choice with the head and central office of every department and agency of the federal government and the Governments of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. The Victoria Charter also provided for translation of all provincial and federal legislation.

I make the point that in 1971 the provinces agreed to accept certain linguistic guarantees for the purpose of expressing my hope, and the hope of the government, that the constitutional discussions on linguistic issues that are to take place during the conferences provided for in the Meech Lake Accord will bear fruit and lead to more provinces accepting similar linguistic guarantees already included in the Constitution Act, 1982.

Progress did not stop with Victoria in 1971. The Department of the Secretary of State established various programs for promotion of official languages and support for the development of minority communities. It also concluded a series of agreements with the provinces on minority-language and second-language education. In 1973 Parliament passed a resolution which recognized, within certain limits, the right of public servants to work in the official language of their choice.

[Translation]

And those are but a few examples; the list of federal and provincial accomplishments in the language field is a long one.

But the progress we have seen over the years was not without problems. You will recall the air controllers' crisis which, from 1976 to 1978, stirred up passionate controversy and seriously threatened the good relations between the two linguistic communities.

Quebec's desire to protect French language and culture led to the adoption in 1977 of the Charter of the French Language. Bill 101 aimed to make French the "language of the state and of law as well as the language... of work, of teaching, communications, trade and business."

More recently, you will remember the rifts caused by the linguistic quarrel in Manitoba or by the issue of school administration in Ontario.

These events reminded us that the language issue remains one of the most important and sensitive issues in the country.

[English]

However, although these problems were serious, they did not weaken the firm desire of Canadians to make our nation a more tolerant society, one which respected its differences and was prepared to defend the right of every citizen to live in his or her own culture and language.

While the language question was being debated, bilingualism was gaining ground in the country. Younger people especially have during the 1970s and 1980s shown a remarkably increased interest in learning the other official language and, with it, learning more about their country. Parents who did not have the opportunity to acquire a sufficient knowledge of the other language are insisting upon providing that opportunity for their children. This is true virtually everywhere in Canada. The changing attitudes of Canadians therefore make it possible to forge ahead in this area.

In 1982 the Charter of Canadian Rights and Freedoms enshrined the official character of the French and English languages in the Constitution. The Constitution entrenched the bilingual nature of federal institutions and institutions in New Brunswick and gave citizens the right to receive services from these governments in the official language of their choice. Henceforth, the right to minority language education would also be recognized under the Constitution—an important step ahead for linguistic minorities.

In Ontario Bill 8, providing services in French, was passed in 1986, rewarding the sustained efforts of the francophone minority and marking the culmination of a series of measures adopted over the years by previous Ontario governments. Recent statements by Premier Peterson, moreover, provide some hope that Ontario could become officially bilingual in the next few years.

[Translation]

In Quebec, as elsewhere, certain problems persist. However, the Government of Quebec did recently pass a bill concerning the delivery of social and health services in English. That measure reflects Quebecers' growing confidence in their culture and their language and, although there is still work to be done, is an encouraging sign. There is similar heartening movement in other provinces, and the agreement recently concluded with Saskatchewan is a good example.

This recent progress reflected a broadening of Canadians' attitudes to the language issue, and made possible the recognition, with the Constitutional Accord of 1987, of linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of the Canadian Federation. That recognition will animate the interpretation of the Constitution as a whole, and with it is an affirmation of the role of Parliament and of all legislative assemblies in the protection of that fundamental characteristic. That is an important step for linguistic minorities, important because it will become a foundation of future progress.

[English]

And this is essentially what I am asking honourable senators to do today: to take another step forward in respecting the federal government's commitment to official languages. This commitment is the one we acknowledge in the Meech Lake Accord and it is the same one that was made when our nation was created. It is this commitment which has led to major national crises, but also to some of the greatest moments in our history.

The bill before you today takes us further along the path which the Fathers of Confederation chartered for us—a path marked, when we are true to it, by the principles of justice, tolerance and respect for our fellow citizens.

As the Minister of Justice has indicated—and Mr. Hnatyshyn will be at the disposal of any committee that is established by this house to study it—Bill C-72 consolidates the central elements of Canada's language laws and policies as they have evolved over the past 120 years. It is based upon and consistent with section 133 of the Constitution Act of 1867; sections 16 to 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; the Official Languages Act of 1969; and the 1973 Parliamentary Resolution on Official Languages.

In addition, Bill C-72 complements the 1987 Constitutional Accord, which recognizes Canada's linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of our country and affirms the role of Parliament and the provincial legislatures in preserving that fundamental characteristic.

The bill will provide Canadians with a fair and flexible instrument for preserving and promoting Canada's linguistic duality and it is designed to respond to the needs and challenges of Canadian society in the years to come.

Bill C-72 proposes a new Official Languages Act comprising a preamble, a purpose clause, an interpretation clause and 11 parts.

The objectives of the bill, which are set forth in its preamble and purpose clause, are to ensure respect for the equality of status of Canada's official languages in federal institutions, to support the development of the English and French linguistic minorities and to encourage the advancement of both languages within Canadian society. The final objective of the bill is to set out the various roles and responsibilities of federal institutions in the area of official languages so that Canadians will know more clearly where to go for service and for assistance.

● (1540)

The first five parts of the bill restate constitutionally-based language rights, but otherwise retain the structure of the 1969 act, which is framed in terms of obligations on federal institutions. This combination of rights and obligations sets out and clarifies the rights of Canadians while ensuring that the duty to respect those rights is borne by federal institutions rather than individual employees. It is, in other words, up to the institutions to organize and administer their affairs and personnel in such a way as to fulfill that duty.

For example, clause 16 in Part III imposes a duty on federal courts, other than the Supreme Court of Canada, to arrange their affairs so that judges will be able to follow proceedings in the official language or languages which the parties choose to use. As the wording of this clause makes clear, this is not a duty on individual judges but an institutional duty on the court, to be met by assigning judges capable of functioning in English to hear proceedings held in English, judges capable in French to hear those cases which take place in French, and judges capable of functioning in both languages where both languages are to be used in the proceedings. Clearly, then, this does not mean that all federal judges and adjudicative officers will have to be bilingual.

The first three parts of the bill deal with the proceedings of Parliament, legislative and other instruments and the administration of justice. They build on existing provisions of the 1969 Official Languages Act, modernizing them and bringing them into conformity with the Charter.

Part IV of the bill brings the 1969 act into conformity with the Charter's provision on communications with and services to the public, and provides measures to ensure the practical and effective application of the Charter's principles in this area.

Thus, communications and services must be available in both official languages at every head or central office of federal institutions and, as under the 1969 act, in their offices in the national capital region. They must also be available in either official language at all other federal offices where there is a significant demand in that language. Finally, services must be available in both languages where the nature of the office makes it reasonable to expect bilingual services, as, for example, in the offices of the Privacy Commissioner.

[Translation]

One of the purposes of the 1969 Act was to create regions, known as bilingual districts, where the public would obtain services in both official languages. However, those bilingual districts were never officially implemented because of the difficulties caused by the rigid underlying principle. For instance, federal offices serving a proposed bilingual district were often situated outside the district and consequently were not obliged to provide bilingual services.

That is why the more flexible criteria of the significant demand to be met by an office and of the nature of the office are to be found in the Charter and also in Bill C-72.

Part V, which deals with the language of work in federal institutions, has been added to the 1969 legislation. It derives from Section 16 of the Charter which guarantees that both official languages of Canada will have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and as languages of work.

[English]

Part V clarifies the nature and extent of the right to use either official language as a language of work in federal institutions. It does so by reference to the specific responsibilities of federal departments and agencies in which Canadians work. Most of the duties established by the proposed act are for institutions in the national capital region or in language-of-work regions that have been prescribed by government policy since 1977. In these regions federal institutions will have the duty to ensure that their workplaces are conducive to the use of both languages, thus facilitating the use of either language by the officers and employees of those institutions.

Under the bill, the Governor in Council may issue regulations dealing with services to the public and language of work. Subjects for regulation include the definitions of "significant demand" and "nature of the office", as well as the requirements for supervisors and corporate management in those regions.

Some commentators have expressed doubts about entrusting these subjects to regulations. I wish to emphasize instead the danger of casting too many rules in legislation when Canadians need a general framework that is capable of changing with the times. Government regulations will ensure that the application of the bill remains flexible and practical, that the requirements are fairly adapted to changing circumstances and are workable and effective in serving the people of Canada in accordance with their constitutional rights.

If honourable senators will take the trouble to examine the bill, they will find all manner of safeguards inserted there with regard to the regulations to be brought in and the administration of this law. There is a requirement for consultation with the public in section 84; there is a requirement for pre-publication; there is a requirement for parliamentary review, including the possibility of a negative resolution and so on.

[Translation]

Finally the administration of this act and of any regulations and directives made under this act and the reports of the Commissioner, the President of Treasury Board and the Secretary of State shall be reviewed by a parliamentary committee. Of course the Federal Court shall be able to rule on the validity of any regulation.

[English]

In short, there is no doubt whatsoever that the necessary safeguards to ensure sound regulations, including consultations and review, are provided in the bill. Moreover, unlike the present situation in which the Treasury Board has an almost free hand in setting the rules for implementing official languages programs, it will now be required under Part VIII of the bill to work within the scope set by the bill and the regulations, with all their criteria and consultation and review mechanisms. Consequently, the Treasury Board will have both clearer powers and clearer limits to those powers.

[Translation]

Furthermore, the President of the Treasury Board must table a yearly report to Parliament on the programs involving official languages which she is responsible for.

[English]

Part VI, another addition to the 1969 act, sets out the government's objective of achieving the full participation of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians in our federal institutions. It is an objective; a solemn legislative commitment on the part of the government to ensuring that, subject to the merit principle, English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians have equal opportunities to employment in federal institutions and that the composition of the workforce of federal institutions reflects the presence of both official language communities. This means equitable participation—not, as some have suggested, equal participation—of the two language groups.

Part VII of the bill commits the government to enhancing the vitality and development of the English and French linguistic minority communities and to fostering the recognition, use and learning of both languages in Canadian society, in cooperation with the provinces and the private and voluntary sectors.

Part VII, it should be noted, is another new feature of the bill and complements the commitment to Canada's linguistic duality that is intrinsic to the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord.

[Translation]

In my capacity as Minister of State responsible for Federal-Provincial Relations, I would also like to point out that this part provides a powerful boost to our cooperation with the provinces and territories on official languages. In fact, since the bill was tabled, we have signed several general agreements with New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island and Yukon to promote official languages, and negotiations are taking place with several other provinces.

Clause 82, reflecting the emphasis in the Constitution on language rights, provides that Parts I to V, which arise from language guarantees provided by the Constitution, shall prevail in the event of any inconsistencies over any other act of Parliament or regulation.

[English]

In addition, because there is a judicial recourse under section 24 of the Charter, the bill provides a similar one under Part X. If the courts are to accept the new Official Languages Bill as a reasonable approximation of the language provisions of the Constitution, court enforcement must be possible.

• (1550)

However, under Part IX of the bill, complainants will first go to the Commissioner of Official Languages. The commissioner is charged with the ombudsman-like responsibility of investigating complaints and attempting to settle them in a reasonable manner. This part also provides a safeguard for rights relating to languages other than English or French. Clause 83 states that nothing in the Official Languages Act abrogates or derogates from any right concerning languages other than English and French.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Those two are the same as in the present act.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point the honourable senator is making.

In addition, clause 90 states that nothing in the act abrogates or derogates from any powers, privileges or immunities of members of the Senate or the House of Commons in respect of their personal offices and staff. Clause 91 prevents the application of official language requirements to the staffing of positions unless the requirements are objectively necessary to perform the functions of the position.

The last three parts of the bill—XII to XIV—deal with amendments to other federal legislation. The Criminal Code, which, since 1978, has provided for the accused's right to a trial before a provincial court judge or judge and jury who speak the official language of the accused, will be amended to spell out other rights, such as the right to interpretation and to a crown prosecutor who speaks the accused's language. This reflects the current practice of providing trials in the language of the accused.

Indeed, the language-of-trial provisions of the Criminal Code have been in force for several years now in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and New Brunswick and in the two territories. They have recently come into force in Saskatchewan and, with respect to summary conviction offences, in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Consultations are ongoing with the provinces to bring these provisions into force in every jurisdiction as soon as possible, but clause 96 of the bill will ensure that this occurs by 1990 at the latest.

The bill also implements the language agreements with the Northwest Territories and Yukon in several ways. Clauses 97 and 98 fulfill one of the terms of the federal-territorial agreements, notably the Government of Canada's undertaking to entrench the language rights and services contained in the territorial ordinances by protecting them from unilateral legislative action.

[Translation]

Those were, briefly, the main provisions of Bill C-72. I would like to point out that the bill was drafted with great care while considering the experience of the past nineteen years and drawing inspiration from that experience. Thus, the bill contains a substantial number of recommendations formulated by parliamentary committees that, over the years, had occasion to examine the issue of official languages, by commissioners of official languages, and by language minority organizations. Furthermore, there was consultation and there were meetings with the Commissioner of Official Languages, with representatives of Canada's language minorities and with other interest groups.

These in-depth debates that were remarkable for their frankness resulted in a piece of legislation that has been highly praised by both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians across this country.

[English]

It has also been praised and supported by both opposition parties in the other place. Indeed, the Liberal official languages critic, Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, a member with many years of experience in the field of official languages, commended the government for its initiative in bringing the bill forward and indicated his party wished to see it adopted as soon as possible.

In addition, clarifications and improvements were made in response to concerns about the scope and precise meaning of some of the bill's provisions which were raised during the house committee hearings.

Honourable senators, I have taken rather a lot of your time to describe something of the historic background of this bill. It is a very long road, starting before Confederation, that has taken us here. I want to say with every confidence that this bill provides for a legislative framework that is fair, reasoned and balanced. It is forward-looking and reflects both Canada's linguistic reality and its aspirations. Bill C-72 will ensure greater linguistic equality of opportunity and justice for all Canadians and thus merits the support of all honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, as the joint chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, it gives me pleasure to speak in the debate on second reading of Bill C-72, respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada.

I listened with great interest to Senator Murray, a senator who has worked very hard as a member of the Joint Committee on Official Languages and, later, as joint chairman, under whom I was very pleased to serve. However, I disagree with the ramifications of the Meech Lake Accord on Bill 101, Quebec's Charter and Quebec's jurisdiction over languages, although you will see that in other areas I agree entirely with Senator Murray.

I should now like to give you my view of Bill C-72.

As you know, since its passage in 1969 the Official Languages Act has not been amended in any way, despite numerous requests for changes from the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, the Commissioner of Official Languages and linguistic minority communities. Moreover, approximately 30 private members' bills concerning the Official Languages Act have been tabled in the House of Commons since 1970.

The requests for change were prompted by a weakening of the scope of the act as a result of court decisions, such as those by the Federal Court in the case of L'Association des Gens de l'Air du Québec. These decisions pointed out two major weaknesses in the act: first, the act's declaratory rather than executory nature, which means that no remedy is provided through the courts but only through complaints to the Commissioner of Official Languages; and, second, its lack of primacy over other federal enactments.

The coming into force of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 reduced the usefulness of the act even further because of its constitutional nature and because of the opportunity it provided to citizens to seek redress through the courts under section 24. However, the linguistic rights guaranteed in sections 16 to 22 of the Charter express principles only, and are not implementation mechanisms. The constitutional provision is not sufficient for the enforcement of its principles. A modification of the Official Languages Act was, therefore, necessary for the implementation of bilingualism in language of service, language of work and equitable participation, in conformity with the provisions of the Charter.

With this need to reform the present act, the government wanted to make the Official Languages Act conform to the Charter to define how the latter would be enforced and to introduce additional rights. There are enough new elements in Bill C-72 to justify the repeal of the existing act and its replacement with the proposed legislation.

Let us look at some of these changes. Bill C-72 contains a preamble and 111 clauses set out in 14 parts, as compared with the 39 sections of the present act. It therefore contains several new elements, such as language of work, equitable participation of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, the advancement of French and English, the responsibilities of Treasury Board in this regard and court remedy.

• (1600)

The very presence of a preamble, rare in public law, is evidence of the importance accorded to the bill, because section 12 of the Interpretation Act stipulates that the preamble of an enactment shall be read as a part of that enactment intended to assist in explaining its purpose. Thus, a preamble is an interpretation provision which may be used in the future.

It is also interesting to note that the preamble assigns responsibility to the federal government for the advancement of official languages whereas the 1987 Constitutional Accord, the Meech Lake Accord, assigns the task of safeguarding the language to both the federal and the provincial governments, with Quebec given the added responsibility of promoting its own distinct character.

Bill C-72 has a threefold purpose: first, to ensure the equal status of the two official languages; second, to support the development of official language minority communities and advance the equality of status of the two official languages; and, third, to set out the powers, duties and functions of federal institutions in this area. It is sad that the government has decided to change the original wording of section 2 of the bill, which refers to strengthening federal official language legislation.

The definitions in the bill are a step forward in that they specify the concept of "federal institution". With the specific reference to both houses, there will be no more questions concerning the application of the Official Languages Act to Parliament. It has been politically uncomfortable to be charged with overseeing the application of the present act when, legally speaking, we are not even covered by it. It is also interesting to note that Bill C-72 provides for simultaneous interpretation of the debates and other proceedings of Parliament, which at present is neither a constitutional nor a statutory right. Simultaneous interpretation was provided, following an order of the House in 1958 and the adoption of a Senate report in 1960. This is indeed a tribute to the mutual respect which each linguistic group has for the other.

[Translation]

However, it would have been desirable to extend the definition of crown corporations to cover subsidiaries that are not 100 per cent owned by such corporations, since selling a mere 1 per cent of the capital stock of one of these subsidiaries would be sufficient to exempt it from compliance with the bill. This definition does not go as far as the Commissioner of Official Languages would have wished, when he suggested in February 1986 that the legislation apply to all subsidiaries where a substantial percentage of the shares are owned by crown corporations. In its report in 1983, the Special Joint Committee had also recommended the legislation should apply to semi-public companies. Interestingly, the bill makes no mention at all of the privatization of crown corporations. One wonders why, when we realize that it was Canadian taxpayers, both Anglophones and Francophones, who made it possible to create these corporations.

[English]

We should appreciate the bill's requirement that the federal government must make agreements between Canada and other countries, and in some cases between Ottawa and a province or provinces, available in both official languages. However, not all federal-provincial agreements would be covered, despite recommendations made by the former Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Maxwell Yalden, and the representatives of the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec before the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages in 1982 as well as by the committee itself in its report to Parliament of April 1982. I hope that this regulation will be interpreted broadly so that it covers as many federal-provincial agreements as possible. I would appreciate having some clarification of how this provision would be implemented in an agreement between the Province of Quebec and the federal government. Would the agreement be in French only? Would English and French be used in certain matters, such as education?

Concerning the administration of justice, the bill specifies that a judge or judges would have to understand, without the assistance of an interpreter, the official language or languages in which proceedings were conducted. This provision will correct the situation resulting from the 1986 decision in the case of the Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick, where the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the right to use English or French in any proceeding or pleading before a federal court, prescribed in section 19(11) of the Charter, does not include the right to be understood. Nobody can contest the addition of such a provision. However, I hope that judges will be truly bilingual so that they can support the linguistic rights of the people. It is not enough to provide a right; the follow-up is just as important. One wonders why there should be a further five-year delay for almost all federal courts, such as the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, the CRTC and the National Parole Board, when application will be immediate for the Federal Court of Canada and the Tax Court of Canada.

In the same matter, I am of the opinion that Bill C-72 should also impose an obligation of bilingualism on the Supreme Court of Canada. Though the composition of the Supreme Court bench may make implementation more difficult, I share the opinion that there is a place for some obligation on the part of the Supreme Court, due to the importance and the role of this institution. Perhaps the requirement to understand without the assistance of an interpreter could be imposed on only the presiding officer. This would be feasible, considering that six of the nine present judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are already bilingual. It is our role, as legislators, to look at this problem.

Communication with the public, like language of work and equitable participation, is a pillar of bilingual policy in Canada and is provided for in section 20(1) of the Charter. Thus, every federal institution has the duty to communicate with the public in English and French within the National Capital Region, from its headquarters and wherever there is a significant demand. It appears that most remains to be done in the last respect. The bill would repeal the notion of bilingual districts, which was never implemented because of its complexity and the arbitrary allocation of districts on a territorial basis. Unfortunately, the concept of significant demand is still undefined and will have to be specified by regulation. I think it would have been appropriate to provide such a definition in this act, but the government has decided not to follow that course. Moreover, I would appreciate having clarification of how these provisions will affect communications with the anglophone public in the province of Quebec. Also, in regard to communication with the public, I applaud the bill's provision for "active offer" of bilingual services so that the public will know when such services are available.

[Translation]

Provisions relating to the language of work and participation of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians reinforce the provisions of the 1973 parliamentary resolution by giving them force of law. It is indeed fortunate that these concepts were made an integral part of the legislation instead of continuing as part of the parliamentary resolution.

The bill provides minimum criteria for the bilingual capability of supervisors and senior management. As in the case of communications with the public, the extent of rights related to the language of work will be laid down in the regulations. However, the procedure for putting such regulations in place has been made far more complex as a result of persistent demands.

For instance, a draft of the proposed regulation shall be tabled thirty sitting days before it is published in the Canada Gazette, and the proposed regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least thirty sitting days before its effective date, to allow interested persons to make representations to the President of the Treasury Board. With respect to the designation of bilingual regions or areas in this country, proposed regulations shall be tabled thirty sitting days before their effective date. Each house shall vote on any motion to disapprove of the proposed regulation signed by thirty members of the House of Commons or fifteen senators. If motions are received by both houses, the latter shall vote on the proposed regulation. A form of veto is therefore implicit.

[English]

Concerning equitable participation, the bill provides that the composition of the work force of federal institutions must reflect the presence of both official language communities of Canada. I hope that this provision will help to correct the present lack of English-speaking Canadians in the federal work force in the province of Quebec. Here again, follow-up is essential for the achievement of linguistic rights.

One of the most interesting parts of the bill is that relating to the advancement of English and French, an aspect already being looked after through existing programs of the Secretary of State. As you know, bilingualism is not a matter that concerns only the federal level of government. Although Bill C-72 has mandatory provisions regarding federal institutions, there are also some important provisions concerning other levels of government, such as the provinces.

I believe the Secretary of State should work actively to advance the equality of status and use of English and French in Canadian society. Although these provisions are included in the bill, I have some doubts concerning the will to implement them, especially following the statements of Mr. Rémillard, the present Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec, who is responsible for federal-provincial relations concerning compliance with Bill 101, and the permissive reaction of the Secretary of State of Canada, Mr. Lucien Bouchard. I would like to know from the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice whether my understanding of Part VII of the bill is correct or if there is another interpretation.

● (1610)

As I said earlier, a main aspect of the current act is the absence of court remedy. Even a complaint system would be a good thing, if there were also the political will to support it. Unfortunately, nothing can ensure such will. The advantage of having a court solution will be to impose a remedy that political power cannot impose. This is the perfect illustration of how the act can conform to the Charter. Moreover, I agree that the Commissioner of Official Languages should have the right to go before the court on behalf of a plaintiff. The cost of such a remedy would, in that case, be assumed by the commissioner's office. Lastly, the commissioner's expertise in linguistic matters would be invaluable in these linguistic cases.

[Translation]

As Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, I am also delighted to see that the bill provides for a specific role for a committee of the Senate, of the House of Commons or a joint committee, which, I hope, will be the present one. Its role will be to review the application of the bill, its regulations and directives, and the implementation of the reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages, the President of the Treasury Board and Secretary of State. Better dissemination of information by central agencies, thanks to these annual reports, will undoubtedly help the committee to be as effective as possible.

Finally, I am glad to see that the bill expands the rights of the accused, which include the right to bilingual forms, to public proceedings and a written judgment in their own language. However, what is even more important is the implementation of rights provided under Part XIV.1 of the Criminal Code across this country as of January 1, 1990.

[English]

In conclusion, although the government has been slow in this matter since the first reading of the bill on June 25, 1987, the present version, incorporating amendments adopted by the legislative committee of the House of Commons, is, for the most part, satisfactory, although I still prefer the original wording, which referred to strengthening the laws of Canada relating to official languages.

My satisfaction ensues from the bill's main features, which are: its quasi-constitutional nature, as shown in its primacy over other instruments; its executory nature; its incorporation of the parliamentary resolution of 1973; and its wording, which is more explicit than that in the present act.

I am pleased with most of the proposed legislation on official languages in Canada, but the importance of this matter makes it legitimate to demand some clarification of how it will be implemented.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I don't intend to make a speech. I simply want to direct a few comments to the government.

Although it has taken the government some time to table C-72 in Parliament, I think that nevertheless it has done an excellent job and deserves our congratulations.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate is also to be commended for his comments this afternoon when he explained the tenor of Bill C-72.

Senator Wood, the Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, also made a number of comments and noted some of the bill's defects. I agree the bill is not perfect—no legislation ever is. However, it is a step forward, and I repeat that the government acted wisely in tabling Bill C-72, because it wasn't easy.

[English]

It was not easy for this government to pass Bill C-72—I know something about that—but it had the courage to go through with it and to implement what the Leader of the Government in the Senate has referred to this afternoon as a measure of justice, tolerance and respect for each other's culture.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Robichaud: As was pointed out by Senator Murray, that trend may have started with the B & B Commission, on which Senator Frith served as a commissioner. It submitted its report in 1967, and the government of the day saw fit to implement most of the recommendations of that commission.

Honourable senators, the Province of New Brunswick did likewise. In Canada it was not easy to implement this sort of measure; in New Brunswick it was not easy, either. The Acadians constitute 33 per cent of the population of that province. We were faced with a dilemma in implementing one portion of the recommendations that called for the creation of bilingual districts. I looked at the map of New Brunswick and I would have had to divide it up like some sort of jigsaw puzzle. I was not happy with that, so I submitted to my caucus the idea of making the whole province a bilingual district. That was agreed to unanimously.

In 1969 Richard Hatfield was the leader of the opposition. I know, because he told me subsequently, that he had difficulty in his caucus, but in the legislature official bilingualism was adopted unanimously, and we were pleased. Actually, even today, 19 years later, New Brunswick remains the only officially bilingual province in Canada. We are proud of that fact. As I have said, it was not easy, but it can be done.

Honourable senators, we will forever find difficulties with this proposition. We in New Brunswick have opponents to official bilingualism. Although their number is dwindling, they still exist. Perhaps they help the cause of bilingualism by exposing themselves publicly on occasion.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate mentioned the possibility that Ontario might eventually become bilingual. That would be a step forward. That would be great, and the number of people in Ontario who are in opposition to that concept is smaller and smaller by the year. I know that official bilingualism is not hurting anybody. It is helping everybody, and that is a fact. Some people think they are going to lose something through official bilingualism. That is just not so. The Francophones do not want to take anything away from the Anglophones, and that holds true for the people in the province of Quebec. They want their rights to be recognized throughout the country, and that is what all Canadians should want—equal rights from Bonaville to Victoria.

Honourable senators, I repeat that I am happy with the measure taken by the government and I was favourably impressed, indeed, by the remarks made this afternoon by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, although I did not intend to enter into this debate, in listening to the presentations that have been made here today, I feel it incumbent upon me to say something which I am reasonably sure will not find great favour in this house, and perhaps will not find great favour in certain parts of the country.

• (1620)

I would start by saying that I am in favour of this legislation and I will vote for it, because I believe that the policy of bilingualism in Canada is the right policy. I have been in favour of it since it first arrived in the form of legislation and the form of a very forward thought.

However, there is something going on in Canada that is a real danger to the concept of bilingualism. I can only speak for my province of Manitoba, perhaps with some knowledge of the prairie provinces and a little knowledge of B.C. My purview is geographically limited. Nonetheless, I have to tell you that in my province and throughout western Canada I believe there has been a certain amount of bad will—but also a lot of good will—towards the concept of bilingualism.

Many people in western Canada are ensuring that their children become bilingual. They are not doing it because they are being forced. They are doing it because they feel that it is the right thing to do, that they are making the true Canadian, who has a real cultural difference as between his or her nationality and that, say, of the United States. So that good will is there, and it will grow and continue to grow.

But there is something going on in the province of Quebec that distresses us greatly in western Canada; there is a strong feeling that is portrayed to us that Quebec wants to become unilingual and that the English minority in Quebec is not receiving fair treatment. I say that that feeling exists in western Canada. It exists because of Bill 101; it exists because English signs posted by Zeller's are torn down. It exists because Mr. Bourassa finds it difficult to live up to his election promises. There is concern, and I believe that Quebec can damage the very worthwhile concept of bilingualism if it is not careful. That is something that is an obligation on Quebec just as much as it is on my area of western Canada.

There is another part of it that distresses me greatly, and that is the actions of the federal government in respect of minority linguistic rights, for example, in Manitoba as opposed to those that exist in Quebec.

When the matters of the rights of the French minority in Manitoba to have bilingual legislatures, statutes in both official languages, and the right to appear before the courts in either language came forward, there was an immediate appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, which was financed by the federal government. The Supreme Court of Canada decided that the statutes had to be translated. That has been done and, I believe, is largely completed at this stage. However, the federal government went one step further. It decided that Manitoba should be officially bilingual. A joint resolution was passed by both houses of Parliament, calling upon Manitoba to become bilingual. There was enormous pressure put on Manitoba to become officially bilingual. That did not happen. I personally think it is regrettable that it did not happen. I wish it had, but, nonetheless, it did not.

If we compare the actions of the federal government in respect of Manitoba's intransigence on bilingualism with what has happened over Bill 101, there is quite a startling contrast. I do not see that the federal government has assisted the English linguistic minority in Quebec to bring the matter before the Supreme Court. So as far as I know, no funds have been given to them for that purpose, although I may indeed be corrected on that. I have not heard any ringing speeches in Parliament. I have not heard of a joint resolution of the Parliament of Canada calling on Quebec to get rid of Bill 101.

So I say to you this, honourable senators: I am very much in favour of Bill C-72. I think it is a great step forward, but it will take as much good will on the part of the French in the province of Quebec as it will take on the part of the non-French in the rest of Canada to make it work. When Manitoba is wrong and when Quebec is wrong, it will take fortitude on the part of the government and the Parliament of Canada to stand up and say, "You are wrong." If that is not done, then the process of Bill C-72 and the very worthwhile attempt to make Canada a bilingual country will fail.

[Translation]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am a Quebec allophone. I would like to set the record straight on certain things that were said by Senator Everett. There is no comparison at all between these cases. I know the Government of Quebec has a serious problem with the language on signs. However, there are English schools in Quebec wherever there are Anglophones. These schools are operated by the Anglophones themselves, and that includes elementary, secondary, college or university level.

For instance, McGill University is one of the academic glories of this country. It is located in Quebec. It may be true that grants to anglophone universities have not been as generous as those to francophone universities in Quebec. However, some francophone universities had a lot of catching up to do, and that has now been done.

It would be unfortunate to compare the situation in Manitoba with the situation in Quebec.

I deplore the attitude of some Quebecers for whom extreme dedication to the exclusive use of French has taken the place of what in the past was an unqualified dedication to the Catholic faith.

In all countries and all parts of Canada, there are people who hold extreme opinions. Generally, however, all the polls show that tolerance for the English fact is very high in Quebec.

If the Government of Quebec has some problems with its opposition, I hope it will deal with them. I don't think it is fair to compare the treatment of Anglophones in Quebec with that of Francophones in Manitoba, Alberta or Saskatchewan. It would be comparing apples and oranges.

[English]

When it comes to the west, one has to say about the treatment of the Francophones, "When did you stop beating your wife?" In Quebec, at most, they might say, "Why are you slapping your wife's wrist?" Those are the relationships: a big whipping on the one side and a gentle tap on the other.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I rise only because I believe my remarks have been totally misinterpreted by the honourable senator. I shall not debate with him on a phrase-by-phrase basis.

It is not the comparison between how the minorities are treated in the various regions of Canada. Rather, my point is that there has been a hardening of attitude in Quebec toward the concept of bilingualism, and I think that is dangerous at a time when the attitude in western Canada, in any event, has been largely one of increasing good will, as Senator Murray has said. That is what I am concerned about. I am even more concerned that in the implementation of this act no fear or favour be shown in respect of any region of Canada in ensuring that the act is implemented properly.

• (1630)

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to tell Senator Gigantès that we do not beat or slap our wives out west.

On motion of Senator Guay, debate adjourned.

RAILWAY SAFETY BILL

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Bill C-105, to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, with one amendment) presented on Thursday, July 7, 1988.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, Bill C-105 is the Railway Safety bill. This transfers the responsibility for railway safety regulation from the Canadian Transport Commission to the Minister of Transport. It also makes the railway companies fully responsible for the safety of their systems, yet gives the Minister of Transport full powers to ensure compliance. It also streamlines the approval process to ensure a more effective regulatory framework, which will keep regulations up to date into the 1980s and 1990s, and will encourage new technology to improve safety on all railroads in Canada. The Governor in Council may make regulations to ensure control over the use of alcohol and drugs in the railroad mode—after, I hope, full consultation with all the railroads and the railroad brotherhoods, especially the employee rehabilitation programs.

Honourable senators, during the committee hearings there appeared to be no standard rules for medical examinations of employees of the railroads of Canada. I believe the CNR said there was a medical every two years; CP stated that they had no medical for operating employees until they reached age 40, and I think it was yearly thereafter.

The amendment to clause 35, Part I, will require persons who are employed in positions critical to the operations of railway systems—the running crews, the dispatchers and others—to have a company-sponsored medical examination, including eye and hearing examinations, at least every 12 months. This standardizes the rules.

As honourable senators know, our chairman, Senator Léopold Langlois, resigned his position on his doctor's orders. On behalf of the committee we wish him a speedy return to full health and thank him for his leadership roles for many years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Turner: As acting chairman, I wish to thank all Senate Transport Committee members, witnesses, the officials from Transport Canada and the staff for their advice and help during the meetings.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Turner, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been asked by Senator Stewart of Nova Scotia to adjourn the debate in his name.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN MULTICULTURALISM BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-93, for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, we have just had the pleasure of listening to one of the most historic debates that will take place in this house. I now rise with great pleasure to begin the debate on what I believe to be another historic piece of legislation: Bill C-93, an act for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada. The short title is the Canadian Multiculturalism Bill.

Honourable senators, I want to emphasize at the beginning that all three parties in the House of Commons came together to approve this most historic piece of legislation. In addition, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, embracing, as it does, 37 national groups, and the Canadian Committee for Racial Justice, consisting of some 35 to 40 regional groups, endorse this legislation and urge its speedy passage.

I wish to add that I have observed on Parliament Hill today Mr. Lewis Chan, President of the Multicultural Ethnocultural Organization; and up until a few moments ago I was also pleased to recognize in the gallery Andrew Cardozo, Executive Director. I am sure they are here anxious to urge us to proceed rapidly with this bill.

We now have before us an historic bill. We now have the opportunity to recognize, accept and embrace the multicultural reality of this country.

Honourable senators, today I should like briefly to outline the contents of Bill C-93 and to show you how it has been systematically improved by the cooperation of all parties in the other place and how this bill reflects the contemporary realities of Canada and sets a course for our future as a dynamic and cosmopolitan nation, playing a key role on the world stage.

Honourable senators, let us examine this bill for a few moments. The bill before us begins with a comprehensive and forceful preamble.

[Senator Turner.]

We heard from Senator Wood the import of the preamble in a bill, act or statute of Canada. This preamble reminds us all of the great cornerstones of our society's major principles and values.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Bill is founded on the guarantees of equality that are contained in section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and also in the multiculturalism clause of the Charter, clause 27.

• (1640)

This bill is rooted in landmark legislation which ensures equality and equal opportunity for all Canadians. But, as we shall see, it is fundamentally different from our human rights and anti-discrimination legislation. Rather, it is a component of a Canadian identity which includes the Official Languages Act, the Citizenship Act, and this multiculturalism legislation.

First and foremost, Bill C-93 states that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic—keep those two words in mind—of our heritage and of our evolving identity. This, honourable senators, is a major achievement. It is a landmark in the recognition of how this country was formed, where we have been and where we are going. I cannot overemphasize the importance of this factor: the strength of this multiculturalism policy for Canadians.

This is a legislative policy statement of the Parliament and Government of Canada. It is far more than merely a policy of the government of the day; a policy which could be eradicated with the stroke of a pen. By enacting this Canadian Multiculturalism Bill, and thus the multiculturalism policy of Canada, we are putting into place concrete assurance of this nation's recognition of multiculturalism.

The multiculturalism policy of Canada provides a comprehensive framework by which the Government of Canada will promote multiculturalism in all aspects of Canadian society. Let me list a number of examples: First, the Government of Canada will recognize the existence of communities whose members share a common origin and recognize the historic contribution of these communities to Canadian society. Second, the Government of Canada will promote the full and equitable participation of all individuals and communities in all aspects of Canadian society. Third, the Government of Canada will encourage all the institutions of our society—financial institutions, educational institutions, other governments and, of course, the voluntary sector—to be respectful and inclusive of Canada's multicultural character.

The full weight of the multiculturalism policy of Canada is to provide a comprehensive, pro-active and cooperative approach to ensuring equality within this nation.

This policy is not about extending additional rights to individuals or groups. This policy is about ensuring equality; it is about working together; it is about cooperation and consensus to build a nation.

We are all aware that we in Canada enjoy one of the world's most comprehensive legislative packages to protect us from discrimination. This bill does not supplant the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Employment Equity Act or the provincial human rights codes. Rather, it complements them by reaching out to build a better and fairer society. It commits the Government of Canada to a pro-active program of building a nation where the worth of all Canadians is sought and valued.

Honourable senators, you will note that clause 3(2) of the bill specifies that all federal institutions shall—and I emphasize the word “shall”—carry out the multiculturalism policy of Canada. This ensures the leadership role of the federal government. We must place our house in order before we can expect others to follow our leadership.

I would now like to turn to the issue of how multiculturalism policy in Canada will be implemented by the government, and specifically within its federal institutions. Clauses 4 and 6 of the bill address these matters.

Clause 4 of the bill specifies that the minister designated responsible for the implementation of the multiculturalism policy in Canada will provide advice and assistance to his cabinet colleagues in developing and implementing programs and practices to support this policy. Clause 6 clearly states that every minister is responsible for implementing the multiculturalism policy of Canada in his or her own area of jurisdiction. These two clauses—clauses 4 and 6—constitute a solid, cross-government commitment. Multiculturalism becomes more than merely a program within one sector of one department; it becomes a program for every department and for every federal institution.

Honourable senators, why is this necessary? It is necessary in order to ensure that the broad policy commitments which this bill contains will be implemented. It is necessary to ensure that the government will lead by example.

Honourable senators, you may be aware that only a few weeks ago the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, the Honourable Gerry Weiner, announced considerable increases in the multiculturalism budget and for the new directions of multiculturalism programs which strengthen the commitments that are contained in Bill C-93. In fact, the total expenditure in the next five years will be $192 million, of which $62 million will be new, additional dollars within that five-year period. This government is building for the future, and I think that should be evident to all of us here today.

Clause 9 of the bill requires that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism submit to Parliament an annual report on the operation of this policy. This is more than a report on merely his or her own activities in the delivery of specific multiculturalism programing. The Honourable Gerry Weiner, and before him the Honourable David Crombie, pledged that this report would explain how the multiculturalism policy of Canada was being implemented in every federal institution. This, again, is a key element of the cross-government commitment of this bill and its accountability mechanisms.

This report will be tabled before both houses of the Parliament of Canada. It will address the whole spectrum of the execution of programs of multiculturalism in Canada. Furthermore, clause 10 of the bill states that the report will be reviewed by a committee of the House of Commons and by a committee of the Senate, or conjointly, as may be designated or established for that purpose.

Honourable senators, the bill we have before us today, which received third reading in the House of Commons yesterday on a unanimous basis, is considerably stronger than the one first introduced in Parliament some seven months ago. First and foremost, the bill was strengthened by stating clearly and precisely that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of our identity and heritage. That was something our ethnic societies were very anxious to see incorporated in the bill, and that has now been done. That was a key proposal of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and of many other representative organizations.

A second important amendment emphasized that every federal institution “shall” implement the multiculturalism policy of Canada, instead of the weaker earlier wording, “should”. I cannot overstate the significance of this simple one-word amendment.

Honourable senators, at the outset of my remarks today I said that this was as a world-class bill and a world first. Yes, it is a world first, and we must not forget the differences of our origins, our traditions and our cultures, because among us there are no limitations but a great enrichment which we can all share together. I should like to remind each and every one of us that our cultural and racial diversity is as old as time in this land. It is about the diversity of Canada's first people, our aboriginal people. It is about the Inuit and about the Dene. It is about the coming together of the Six Nations of the Iroquois. It is about Giovanni Caboto—some of us call him John Cabot. It is about the Black Loyalists who came here after the American Revolution, and it is about Mennonites who came to parts of this country in the 19th century.

• (1650)

Honourable colleagues, my point is this: From the outset this country has been the product of people from all corners of the world. It belongs to all of us, and all our heritages together make up our Canadian heritage.

Senator Haidasz: What about our Newfoundlanders?

Senator Barootes: We include them as well.

Honourable senators, I want to conclude my remarks today by saying that the Canadian Multiculturalism Bill which we are considering here will be an historic document of which we should all be proud. We are privileged to have such a bill before us—such a bill brought to this house from the other place with the unanimous consent of all parties and all members. This bill is an important step in the evolution of this nation. Today we in this chamber are together writing another page in the history books of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-93, for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada, as I have been very much involved with this subject, dating back to 1963 when the Bilingual and Bicultural Commission was formed.

Before dealing with the substance of the bill, I should like to put on record, as concisely as possible, the history of the policy of multiculturalism.

The federal multiculturalism policy was first established over 16 years ago on November 8, 1971. At that time Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau introduced a resolution into Parliament, which was supported by all parties in the house. That resolution committed Canada to a multicultural policy within a bilingual framework. By that time bilingualism had already been adopted as federal policy. The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism recommended that both English and French be given official status, and that was done with the Official Languages Act on July 25, 1969. But the B & B Commission also recommended that no particular culture or cultures should be declared dominant; instead, all of Canada's cultures should be treated with equal respect under a policy of multiculturalism, which meant that Canada did not have an official culture.

[Translation]

In the seventies, considerable progress was made in implementing the policy on multiculturalism. The United Nations proclaimed 1971 as the International Year of the Fight Against Racism and Racial Discrimination.

Wholeheartedly supporting this initiative, Canada took its cue and proclaimed the first decade of the fight against racism and racial discrimination.

[English]

In early 1972 a body called the Multiculturalism Unit was set up within the Department of the Secretary of State. A number of programs of the Citizens' Cultures Division of the Citizenship Branch of the Secretary of State transferred into this new Multiculturalism Unit and subsequent programs were added over the years.

The first minister responsible for multiculturalism was also appointed in 1972. He was Dr. Stanley Haidasz—now Senator Haidasz—a Toronto-born Canadian of Polish origin, who, at the time, was a member of Parliament representing the Parkdale riding. Dr. Haidasz was appointed on November 27, 1972, and served in that post for nearly two years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bosa: In May 1973, during the first year of his appointment, the new minister announced the formation and membership of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism. I am pleased to say that I served as chairman of that council for three years, from 1976 to 1979.

The council was intended to serve as an advisory group to the minister. In March 1984 the council changed its name to the Canadian Multiculturalism Council, but its role remained unchanged. The council's membership has varied between a high of 101 in May 1973 and a low of 30 in March 1984, but usually numbers around 60 members.

[Senator Bosa.]

The Department of the Secretary of State also sponsored the establishment of the Canadian Ethnic Studies Advisory Committee in 1973. Out of those organizational efforts there emerged the Canadian Ethnic Studies Association. This association consists of a network of scholars studying ethnicity in Canada. They hold biannual conferences and publish a Canadian ethnic studies journal, all of which contribute to a better understanding of Canada's ethnocultural communities.

It was also during 1973-74, the program year, that the Canadian Identities Program was created within the Multiculturalism Unit. Under this program, ethnic histories were commissioned and assistance was provided for such projects as ethnic theatre, literature, handicrafts, folk art, et cetera. Almost immediately the Canadian identities program began providing assistance for various chairs of ethnic studies at different universities across the country.

One further development in 1974 was the initiation of the Canadian Heritage Festival as an annual celebration. That same year the Province of Saskatchewan, where Senator Barootes comes from, introduced the first Multiculturalism Act in Canada.

Each of the years 1976 and 1977 saw the publication of a milestone study on Canada's ethnocultural communities. The "Non-Official Languages" report was published by the Department of the Secretary of State in 1976. Based on an extensive survey, it concluded that many of Canada's non-official language groups did want provisions for their children to be taught their mother tongue so as to retain their cultural identities. In 1977 the cabinet responded to these concerns by approving the cultural enrichment program for the support of heritage languages.

The "Multiculturalism and Ethnic Attitudes in Canada" report was published by the Secretary of State in 1977. That report, which was also based on a nationwide sample, confirmed that, although multiculturalism was gaining public support, there was still evidence of considerable prejudice and discrimination across the country.

The government responded to the multiculturalism and ethnic attitudes survey by proposing the Canadian Human Rights Act, which was passed on July 14, 1977. When the act was proclaimed on March 1, 1978, the Canadian Human Rights Commission came into operation. The commission did appear to be having some problems handling complaints of racial discrimination for the first few years of its existence. Just recently, however, better training and investigation methods have been adopted; so we can expect better results from now on.

By 1978 the Multiculturalism Unit had had six years of experience in program delivery and development. Based on what had been learned over that time, a decision was taken to reorganize the Canadian Identities Program to include funding for educational resources development. This resulted in the production of supplementary learning materials on multiculturalism for public distribution. A media relations strategy on multiculturalism was also developed as part of this reorganization.

• (1700)

The 1978 structural changes led to a more substantial reorganization the following year. A directorate was established with the mandate to increase citizen awareness of the issues involving multiculturalism. That was also the year the first study was commissioned to examine and recommend solutions to adjustment and integration problems faced by immigrant women.

Not only was 1981 the 10th anniversary of multiculturalism policy but it also witnessed some new beginnings of its own. A race relations unit was established within the multiculturalism directorate. The first national conference on immigrant women was also sponsored by the directorate. In addition, the directorate also participated in the first National Conference on Heritage Languages and in the first National Conference on Multiculturalism in Education. So 1982 represents a banner year for multiculturalism. First and foremost, there was the recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage enshrined in section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Judge Turnapowski, at a public meeting at the Columbus Centre in Toronto, attributed to Mr. Lawrence Decore, the Mayor of Edmonton, and myself the credit for the insertion of the clause in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I take great pride in that change. That same year the multiculturalism directorate developed a number of strategies to address the needs of immigrant women. The directorate also sponsored a national symposium on race relations and the law and a National Conference on Visible Minorities and the Media.

December of 1983 began a development in multiculturalism policy which led directly to the bill we are considering here today. That was the occasion of the appointment of the House of Commons Special Committee on Visible Minorities in Canadian Society. That committee spent three and one-half very productive months in public hearings and report writing. The result was the "Equality Now!" report of 1984, and the 80 recommendations made then continue to receive support both in and out of government to this day.

Of the many recommendations in the "Equality Now!" report, one in particular had a direct bearing on all subsequent developments. That recommendation was for the establishment of a permanent parliamentary committee on multiculturalism. On June 28, 1985, the Speaker issued a standing order creating the House of Commons Standing Committee on Multiculturalism, and it has been functioning ever since.

Right from the beginning the Multiculturalism Committee took its mandate very seriously. Deliberations were begun with a series of public hearings in the fall of 1985 and in the winter and spring of 1986. During that time a number of ethnocultural spokespersons were heard from, together with presentations from such umbrella groups as the Canadian Ethnocultural Council—the executive secretary of which is sitting in the gallery, Mr. Andrew Cordoza—and the Canadian Council for Multicultural and Intercultural Education. The committee also welcomed appearances by the minister responsible for multiculturalism and by other governmental officials.

During 1986 the committee decided to issue a public report as a way of making a contribution to multiculturalism policy-making. Once that decision was taken, the committee sought the widest possible input that would be compatible with being able to complete the report in a timely fashion. To broaden their perspective, committee members turned to the provinces for their experience with multiculturalism legislation, policies, programs and agencies.

From officials within the multiculturalism sector the committee learned that consultations had already been undertaken with many ethnocultural groups. The conclusions from those consultations were also made available to the committee.

Based on these inputs, a clear consensus emerged. That consensus was reflected in the committee's report, entitled "Multiculturalism: Building the Canadian Mosaic", which was tabled on the June 29, 1987.

The consensus that emerged from the committee's hearings and deliberations was reflected in the report's 18 recommendations regarding the future of national multiculturalism policy. Recommendation No. 1 called for a clear set of principles to be embodied in all future multiculturalism policy. These principles include equity, bilingualism, equality of opportunity, cultural diversity, elimination of discrimination, affirmative measures, enhancement of heritage languages, and support for immigrant integration.

Recommendation No. 2 lists the wide range of departments, agencies and programs that will be affected by an enhanced multiculturalism policy. These involve all three levels of government and broad policy areas, such as social policy, economic policy and cultural policy. Recommendation No. 3 calls for all relevant departments to implement new policy and for coordinating committees to be established to ensure effective results.

Recommendations Nos. 4 and 5, respectively, advise provinces and municipalities to develop and/or maintain their own multiculturalism policies and programs so as to complement federal efforts. Only in that way will multiculturalism become a living reality.

Recommendations Nos. 6 through 16 deal with the establishment and operation of a new multiculturalism infrastructure and department. To begin with, a full-fledged and independent department of multiculturalism is advocated. It is further suggested that to this new department should be transferred the multiculturalism sector, citizenship development and citizenship registration agencies from the Department of the Secretary of State. In addition, the report recommends that the new department should acquire the settlement program from the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the cultural support programs and responsibilities for the Canada Council from the Department of Communications.

Next, it was recommended that the budget of the proposed department of multiculturalism should be increased by 25 per cent a year for at least four years. Then the new department should substantially increase its personnel, especially in the area of community development and liaison with the public.

The committee also wanted to see forthcoming better knowledge and advice on multiculturalism. Hence, it suggested the establishment of a Canadian centre for multiculturalism that will conduct research, develop a data bank on ethnocultural minorities and make information available to the public. The committee also proposed that the Canadian Multiculturalism Council should be reconstituted so as to be more representative of Canada's demographic distribution, and that it should reflect a grass roots view and maintain a more visible public profile.

Within the rest of the federal government, the following structural changes were recommended. A commissioner of multiculturalism was suggested to monitor federal implementation of multiculturalism policy and report to Parliament on the results. That was not done. The position of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Multiculturalism should get permanent status. Another proposal was that the Prime Minister needs a full-time multiculturalism adviser, and a further suggestion was that cabinet should establish a distinct committee on multiculturalism, to be chaired by the Minister of Multiculturalism.

Regarding intergovernmental relations, the committee recommended that a council of federal-provincial-municipal ministers responsible for multiculturalism should be created. And, lastly, the committee affirmed that efforts of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities to improve race and ethnocultural relations in municipalities across Canada should continue to get federal support and cooperation.

Of course, all 16 of these recommendations were contingent upon the introduction of an act respecting Canadian multiculturalism. The committee report set out an outline of such an act and suggested that the job of drafting it be undertaken by lawyers with a background of experience in human rights legislation.

What made all of these recommendations so remarkable was the wide consensus within the committee and the strong support of the ethnocultural communities across the country. What this created, in effect, was a window of opportunity for the government to move in a creative and substantial fashion. There was considerable anticipation through the summer and fall of 1987 as everyone concerned awaited the official government response to the committee report. In December the government tabled its response and introduced Bill C-93, the Canadian Multiculturalism Bill, for first reading.

• (1710)

Unfortunately, Bill C-93 is only a pale reflection of the recommendations contained in the Multiculturalism Committee's report. The government has accepted the idea of a multiculturalism statute, but it has rejected the recommendations for a full-fledged department, a full-time minister and an independent commissioner. What the bill represents, then, is form without much substance.

[Senator Bosa.]

This lack of substance becomes readily apparent once the bill is examined. There is a relatively lengthy preamble, making reference to various other statutes and conventions and to a number of clauses of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. These are all very interesting and inspiring, but, since a preamble is not binding in law, such references are really not much more than political rhetoric. Until now multiculturalism policy has simply rested on a discretionary commitment by successive federal governments. As things currently stand, multiculturalism programs could be either drastically reduced or fundamentally redirected, a possibility which worries many ethnocultural groups. However, beyond giving current commitments legal status, the bill's provisions do not amount to much.

[Translation]

For instance, that part of the bill which deals with the multiculturalism policy of Canada contains ten policy statements. These attest to the government's will to promote the following principles: Cultural enhancement and cultural exchange; multicultural heritage and identity; equality and suppression of discrimination; recognition of the contribution of multicultural communities to our history; equality and diversity; the evolution of our main institutions in terms of the multicultural character of Canada; mutual understanding among the various groups; cultural enhancement; promotion of other languages within a bilingual context; and harmony between multiculturalism and bilingualism.

[English]

Subclause 3(2) of the bill contains a further six paragraphs on federal institutions, whose objectives can be summarized as follows: equal employment opportunity in federal institutions; policies which promote cultural contributions; policies which respect cultural diversity; collection of multicultural data to inform policy development; utilization of the cultural heritage of individuals, and sensitization of federal activities to multicultural reality.

The clause of the bill on implementation does not do much better. In this case there are 11 clauses to the minister's mandate, but they refer almost entirely to existing programs, as the following summary indicates: "Advance multiculturalism in Canada and abroad". This includes cultural exchanges and core funding for ethnocultural groups; "support ethnic studies and research", which refers to the chairs of ethnic studies and the writing and publications program; "encourage understanding between groups", referring to the intercultural communications program; "sensitize mainstream institutions", which refers to the cultural integration program; "preserve and enhance multicultural heritage", which refers to the performing and visual arts program; "facilitate heritage language use", which refers to the cultural enrichment program; "overcome racial discrimination", referring to the Proclamation of a Second Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, signed by the Prime Minister on March 21, 1986; "support those promoting multiculturalism", which refers to the group development program; and "undertake additional appropriate projects", which is a catch-all clause to include other programs now or in the future.

The new ground covered by this bill comes as a result of public pressure. Now multiculturalism is recognized as a "fundamental characteristic" in the preamble and in paragraph 3(1)(b) of the bill. Thus it is on a par with bilingualism. The idea of an annual report to Parliament on the government's progress in implementing multiculturalism is new, but, as specified in this bill, it is likely to cause problems. The final paragraph of the bill stipulates that a designated parliamentary committee be assigned the tasks of reviewing the annual report and monitoring the operation of the act. This means that the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism will have the joint responsibilities of examining the multiculturalism estimates, assessing the multiculturalism annual report and evaluating the multiculturalism sector's performance. These increased responsibilities will overload the committee, unless considerably more money and staff are allocated to them to do the job; yet there is no recognition of such needs anywhere in the bill.

These concerns are also echoed by members of the multiculturalism committee itself. Mr. Sergio Marchi, MP for York West, had this to say about the bill in a news release of December 1, 1987:

This Bill can be best described as a missed opportunity. While legislating the principles of the policy is certainly a positive undertaking, the Minister has failed to provide multiculturalism with the same government support mechanisms that were extended to official bilingualism many years ago.

The obligation to implement multiculturalism in all federal institutions was strengthened as the commitment was changed from "should" to "shall".

The Canadian Multiculturalism Council was given an increased mandate to report to the minister on matters relating to the implementation of the act. This section could have been made stronger by giving this mandate to an independent commissioner. The problem remains that, if a federal institution neglects to do its part, there is no independent commissioner to report to Parliament.

Mr. Lewis Chan, President of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, in a press release dated July 5, 1988, stated:

Bill C-93 is much stronger today than when it was introduced seven months ago. It is now in a form that we can support and in a form that we would want to see entrenched in law. The Government and opposition parties have listened to us and improvements have been made. I call on all three parties to give speedy passage to Bill C-93...

We are still hoping that a more definitive monitoring mechanism can be introduced before passage, or alternatively following a review of the legislation after its first year...

As founders of the policy of multiculturalism, we on this side of the house support this bill and are prepared to give speedy passage to it. We want Bill C-93 to become law as soon as possible. However, in future we will be pressing for some major amendments respecting the recommendations of the Multiculturalism Committee.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong the debate on Bill C-93, which was earlier explained to us by Senator Baroote and on which Senator Bosa, a long-time member of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, has made profound observations and reservations.

• (1720)

At the time of Confederation in 1867 there were not only the two dominant groups in Canada—the English and the French—but also the aboriginal peoples—the native Indians and the Inuit people and others. The original owners of this land, the native Indians and the Inuit, unfortunately, were neglected for a very long time.

I believe it is sad at this time, when we are discussing this bill, that the land claims of the Lubicon Band, who have significant title to their land, have not yet been settled. This problem has become an international concern. As the band dies slowly from tuberculosis and other diseases, it is disintegrating.

It is also significant that approximately 40 per cent of the inmates of Saskatchewan jails are Canadian native Indians, and that Donald Marshall, the subject of a current inquiry in Nova Scotia, spent 11 years in jail for a crime he did not commit—murder. The recent killing of the Canadian Indian leader, J.J. Harper, in Winnipeg further illustrates the treatment which our Canadian Indians have received in this country. The final verdict, absolving the policeman charged with the killing of J.J. Harper, was a clear travesty of justice and, I believe, made a mockery of the Canadian judicial system. There is also the sad event of the recent killing of a Canadian Black in Montreal by a policeman.

I only raise these points because something more than Bill C-93 should be done by this government. It was in the election campaign of 1984 that Brian Mulroney promised justice—not only a multiculturalism act and a separate department of government dealing with multiculturalism with a full minister to run such a department. This was also recommended by the House of Commons Committee on Multiculturalism, as referred to by Senator Bosa, but it was forgotten when this bill, Bill C-93, was written and given third reading and passed yesterday in the other place.

Section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Supporters of the Charter have suggested that this section will assist the courts to formulate decisions on specific sections that fall within the scope of multiculturalism. Section 27 purports to protect multiculturalism. Yet there has been very little judicial or academic consideration of what multiculturalism means within section 27.

We discussed this during our debates in this chamber on the Meech Lake Accord, another flaw in the Canadian Constitution, if it should be approved by the two remaining provinces of Canada. We should not forget that multiculturalism is a process. It must be distinguished from multiculturalism as a policy, which was enunciated in the House of Commons on October 7, 1971 by the Right Honourable Pierre-Elliott Trudeau, and supported by Mr. Stanfield, the Leader of the Opposition, by Mr. Caouette of the Cr ditistes and by Mr. Lewis, the Leader of the NDP. Since that time multiculturalism has grown. I had the responsibility, as the first Minister of State for Multiculturalism, to implement the policy. This policy has been built upon by ministers who followed me. Now we come to the present minister, Gerry Weiner, and this act, Bill C-93.

I will not repeat what Senator Barootes and Senator Bosa have stated this afternoon. Their remarks were true and full enough. However, along with at least one-third of the ethnocultural groups in Canada, I also regret that we do not have a full ministry of multiculturalism, with a minister, as was promised by Mr. Mulroney during the 1984 federal election.

Nevertheless, I would like to see this bill go to committee even today in order that it can be studied this evening or tomorrow, and hopefully given third reading and Royal Assent without delay. No act of Parliament is perfect. This was referred to earlier in a debate on Bill C-72 by my seat mate, Senator Louis Robichaud, whose native province of New Brunswick is the only bilingual province in Canada. However, as Senator Bosa has stated, we have hopes that this bill will be improved upon by further amendments either by this Parliament or the next.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I had not expected to speak today. I had thought this debate might be adjourned and I would speak tomorrow. However, I will speak on it at this time.

I am happy, as others are, to see this bill before us and to see that it came from the House of Commons with the general support that it was given there. Senator Barootes delivered a very eloquent speech on behalf of the government, putting forth his perception of this legislation. That kind of speech sits well in this chamber.

Senator Bosa, taking something of a different course, pointed out the weaknesses that still remain, in our opinion, in this legislation, and he pointed out ways that it might be further improved. I would support those who believe there should be a full ministry of multiculturalism with a minister.

During my lifetime I have had the privilege to associate with many ethnic people in many walks of life. I have felt that Canadians coming to this country from many lands have made a very valuable contribution over the years. I am old enough to remember that when people came to Canada from central Europe in years gone by there was a feeling among many Canadians who were already established here that in some way—maybe some undefined way—those new arrivals were inferior and might or might not some day develop into Canadians of a stature equal to those already here. I have felt that element of discrimination. I believe that attitude is receding, and receding very far, which is most welcome.

We all realize that since the last war the ethnic mix in Canada has changed. This is not the country today that it was 30 or 40 years ago. It has been pointed out that those in Canada outside the Anglo-Saxon group, if I may say so, and outside the French group have been increasing until they number approximately 37 per cent. As I have visited with one ethnic group after another, I have had the feeling and the conviction that, because we have taken an enlightened attitude recently in this country to the contribution that can be made by our ethnic communities, those people from various ethnic backgrounds are very proud to be called Canadians. They count our country different from many other countries. There is a difference in attitudes. Our attitude is not the attitude of the United States, where the official policy is to have a cultural melting pot.

● (1730)

I think we have made great progress. We have a growing number of visible minorities. Compared to those in other countries, our visible minorities are making an equal contribution that compares favourably with that of all the remaining Canadians.

I think that it would be appropriate in the years ahead, as new senators are appointed, for the Senate to become a more accurate reflection of the ethnic mix of this country.

Senator Haidasz: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: This is a welcome measure that makes considerable progress in this field, but further progress should be made.

I wish to add to my statement that the composition of the Senate should reflect the ethnic mix of the nation, and in considering appointments to the Senate in the future I should hope that the economic mix—labour, farmer, professional groups and so on—might be represented in this chamber in a more balanced way.

One of our greatest lacks today is that we do not have senators in this chamber who can be considered, in a proportionate way, to represent, for example, the labour movement. Can the government not mix together in its appointments in the future a Senate that reflects the ethnic mix of this country and reflects in a more general way the various professional and occupational groups in the country?

I am happy to support this legislation and I look forward to supporting legislation in the future that will make even more improvements.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to say one thing about this legislation.

I think it is necessary. I am sorry it is necessary, but it is, and I think it will be a great day when it is not, because the whole country will recognize that there is no division between multiculturalism and something else, because it will be accepted that the whole of Canada is multicultural.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: With respect, at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Frith: You are not moving that it go to committee?

Senator MacEachen: We wanted it to go to committee.

Senator Haidasz: Do you not want it to go to committee today?

Senator Barootes: I am pleased to accede to the wishes of the honourable senators on the other side—

Senator Frith: An important beginning!

Senator Petten: You are learning!

Senator Barootes: —and I refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to do something I overlooked before, and thank those people who participated in this debate: first, Senator Bosa, who outlined to us a history of the development of multiculturalism and its legislation in Canada from his own past experience and stimulation of the growth of this awareness among Canadians; second, to my dear fellow professional, Senator Haidasz, who was our first minister in charge of this particular aspect of Canadian life and culture; and, third, to my friend, Senator Argue, who expressed for me the optimism for the progress of multiculturalism in Canada for the future.

Honourable senators, with those remarks, I thank you for this opportunity to move the reference of this to the committee.

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixty-first report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (collective agreement-operational group of employees), presented on Tuesday, July 12, 1988.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MACEDONIA

DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, July 5, 1988:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the question of Macedonia.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall take 60 seconds of your time by beginning this and, with your permission, adjourning it until tomorrow.

What I want to talk to you about is a compressed version of private talks I had for some three hours with members of the Greek government while in Athens and Salonika during April as a member of a parliamentary delegation, and what they had to say about the Macedonian question, which seems to be affecting, in their minds, relations between Canada and Greece, potentially.

With your permission, I shall adjourn this until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gerald Ottenheimer, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Ian Sinclair, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-137, An Act to provide for incentives to assist in financing exploration for mineral resources and hydrocarbons in Canada and to amend the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, July 6, 1988, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 2, clause 4: Strike out lines 24 to 35 and substitute the following:
 "scribed expenses incurred after
 (a) September 30, 1988 in exploring for any hydrocarbon other than coal, or
 (b) December 31, 1988 in exploring for"
 2. Page 3, clause 5: In the French version, strike out line 10 and substitute the following:
 "aux frais d'exploration admissibles engagés:"
 3. Page 5, clause 6: In the French version, strike out lines 27 and 28 and substitute the following:
 "engagés au cours d'une année civile dans la mesure où est"
 4. Page 18, clause 29: In the French version, strike out line 19 and substitute the following:
 "cours d'une année civile"
 5. Page 19, clause 29: in the French version, strike out line 26 and substitute the following:
 "sibles ou qui découle de la fusion,"
- Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sinclair: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, in June 1987 the government released the white paper on tax reform, which contained a number of proposals that would decrease the attractiveness of flow-through shares. For example, the white paper proposed phasing out the 33 1/3 per cent mining exploration depletion allowance, capping the lifetime capital gains exemption at $100,000, increasing the inclusion rate for taxable capital gains from the existing 50 per cent to 66 2/3 per cent, and a year later to 75 per cent, and making other suggestions that affected the value of incentives to mining and exploration by hydrocarbon industries. These proposals were not completely offset by reductions in the personal rates of taxation.

The notice of ways and means motion introduced in December of last year modified the white paper proposals and extended by six months the period of exploration expenditures at 16 2/3 per cent by reducing the proportion of exploration expenses that will be required to be included in determining the net investment loss.

The result was to bring forth an outcry across the country from oil and gas companies, but particularly junior companies in that area and in the mining area. This was supported by mining communities throughout Canada and by flow-through partnerships. The government responded to these concerns and, in May last, announced what is known as the Canadian Exploration Incentive.

It should be noted that this incentive does not alter the government's tax reform proposals reflecting flow-through shares, with the exception of the extensions that I have mentioned: in one case to October and in the other case to the end of the year. However, it does change the way the matter is handled by providing direct grants to these junior companies at a rate of 30 per cent to a maximum of $10 million in annual expenses. Eligible expenses are currently qualified in the mining industry and in the petroleum industry and are incurred under a flow-through share agreement with the corporation and the investor, they being at arm's length.

This bill, which would implement the incentive program, was introduced in the House of Commons on June 27 and passed the next day. The committee heard witnesses who were experts in flow-through shares and members of miners' and prospectors' associations—again, people knowledgeable in the field. In bringing forth this legislation, the government did so after numerous consultations with people knowledgeable in the field of flow-through shares and in the area of mining and oil and gas development.

There are to be regulations under the bill, and the necessity for these regulations to integrate closely the requirements of the Income Tax Act is being followed by the government and officials in consultation with people in the hydrocarbon and mining industries.

In his appearance before the committee, the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines, the Honourable Gerald Merrihew, urged the speedy adoption of Bill C-137. The purpose is to remove uncertainty concerning the investment environment, as I noted that 30 per cent of these expenses are covered for a period of two years.

The amendments we are proposing, honourable senators, cover a number of technical deficiencies. Four of them deal with bringing into cohesion the French and English provisions of this statute and they are not substantive at all. The first amendment is more substantive, but it is expansive and carries out the intention that the government had when the bill was first introduced, but which, because of drafting, did not carry that intention. This became evident after the passage of the bill by the House of Commons. The bill ensures that the expenses incurred by an issuing corporation, as well as expenses incurred by a joint exploration corporation—and an exploration corporation, in fact, could renounce its expenses to the issuing corporation—are covered by this statute.

Honourable senators, I ask your concurrence in this report and the amendments proposed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. James Balfour: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill, as amended, be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, unless Royal Assent is provided for, one day's notice is usually given for third reading. In this case the bill is being adopted with amendments and will not receive Royal Assent, in any event. It seems to me that we could speed the process by abridging the time and sending the message to the House of Commons so it has the chance to arrive back here for Royal Assent on a day Royal Assent is provided for.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I concur with the remarks made by Senator Frith. The quicker the bill gets to the House of Commons, the earlier they will deal with it. The possibility exists that they will complete their agenda by the end of next week. If this could be placed on the Order Paper to be completed and returned to us, that would be most desirable.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TWENTIETH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-124, An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, July 13, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, for Senator Spivak, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN MULTICULTURALISM BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-93, An Act for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, July 13, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No. As we explained, honourable senators, there is no point in giving the bill third reading now unless there is provision for Royal Assent today. Of course, we would gladly give it third reading now if Royal Assent were provided for, but it is not going to become law today, in any event, so there is no reason not to follow our rules and give the bill third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, there is an old adage: "If at first you don't succeed, try, try, try again", and I will continue to try to expedite the affairs of this honourable chamber—

Senator Frith: According to the rules, of course.

Senator Barootes: —and, in obedience, I suggest that the bill be given third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Frith: There is another old adage, honourable senators: "Some people learn more quickly than others."

Senator Bonnell: On a point of order, honourable senators, a "suggestion" is not enough. The honourable senator either has to make the motion or not make the motion.

Senator Barootes: I move that the bill be given third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-18, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 28, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

[Senator Bonnell]

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, we had hoped to give third reading to both Bill C-93 and Bill S-18 today. That is why the President of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, Mr. Lewis Chan, is in the gallery today.

On motion of Senator Bosa, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 19th July, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

PROSPECTS OF CANADIAN ECONOMY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, July 20, 1988, I will call the attention of the Senate to the prospects of the Canadian economy under the Free Trade Agreement as forecast by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister, and his cabinet.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray had hoped to be here, but apparently he has been unavoidably detained. It is possible that he will be here later this afternoon. However, if honourable senators have questions, I shall be happy to take them as notice and attempt to obtain answers.

SPORT

1991 CANADA WINTER GAMES, CHARLOTTETOWN, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate, my good friend and colleague from Prince Edward Island, Senator Orville Phillips, a long-time Islander, to take note of the fact and draw to the attention of the government members that the Canada Winter Games will be taking place in Charlottetown.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Murray, some time ago said that, if the city of Charlottetown could get its act together on where to put the arena, the government would come forward with substantial grants of money to assist it.

I noticed in the Guardian of Charlottetown on Wednesday, July 6, 1988, a headline stating: "City says no to waterfront, arena goes to CDP", the Charlottetown Driving Park. Now that that decision has been made and the Charlottetown Driving Park is to get the trade centre and the rink, could the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate take as notice and find out for me, for all Islanders and for all of Canada what assistance will be given to aid our small province and that small city to construct that arena for the great Canada Winter Games of 1991?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my colleague from Prince Edward Island for his question. I was unaware that the city of Charlottetown and the province had reached an agreement on the Charlottetown Driving Park.

I will ask the officials to prepare an answer for Senator Bonnell, but in the meantime perhaps he could tell us what the province has agreed to pay. That would expedite the reply.

● (1420)

Senator Bonnell: As soon as I become the Premier of Prince Edward Island, I will do that for him.

Senator Phillips: The senator had his chance, but he lost!

Senator Argue: As soon as you become the Prime Minister, you will give him the bills.

Senator Frith: To quote Senator Barootes: "If at first you don't succeed . . ."

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

USE OF PROVISIONS OF BILL C-72 TO PROMOTE BILINGUALISM IN WORKPLACE IN QUEBEC—POSITION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to revert to more mundane questions than those pertaining to Prince Edward Island. My question arises out of the debate here in this chamber yesterday, when Senator Wood led off on the matter of Bill C-72, the Official Languages Bill.

Today an article appeared in the Montreal Gazette in which it said that Gil Rémillard, in Quebec City, has said that it would be "completely unacceptable" for the federal government to use this bill—that is, Bill C-72—to promote bilingualism in the workplace in Quebec. The article says that Rémillard wrote that to Bouchard.

My question to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does that statement reflect the position of the federal government?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would point out to Senator Lang that further discussion on Bill C-72 will take place in this chamber. It is also anticipated that there will be a committee established to study Bill C-72. I would suggest that he raise these questions either in debate or before that committee.

Senator Lang: May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the same subject matter? Again in the Montreal Gazette this morning, I read an article in which Marcel Masse is quoted as saying:

The position of francophones constitutes a very important element in Canada's evolution and I can assure you the herds of dinosaurs will always be beaten by frogmen commandos.

Is that sort of inflammatory language designed to raise a swarm of WASPs to sting the frogmen to death?

Senator Phillips: The inflammatory language to which the honourable senator refers is, I think, subject to interpretation and perhaps even misinterpretation. I would point out that, on the other side, there have also been a number of statements which could be termed inflammatory.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER AND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I regret the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I shall nevertheless place my question on record so that he may respond on Tuesday next.

My question was simply whether or not he had had an opportunity to check his information with respect to the resignation of the Commissioner of Correctional Service of Canada. Yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that, according to his information, Mr. LeBlanc had received an offer from the Government of Alberta, and that he would check that information, in that it was passing strange that the offer had come within days of a report by the Auditor General of Canada with respect to practices in the commissioner's office.

I ask again, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate check his information with respect to the resignation of Mr. LeBlanc, the commissioner, and with respect to Mr. Gordon Pinder, the Deputy Commissioner of Correctional Service of Canada. The only resignation that seems to be missing is that of the minister.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): I will draw to the attention of Senator Murray the question directed by the Honourable Senator Hastings.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

STATUS OF MR. GANONG—APPROVAL OF PAYMENTS TO BOARD MEMBERS—INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED LOAN IRREGULARITIES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate could also find out if it is true that Mr. Ganong, of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency board, has resigned, and, if so, the reason behind his resignation. And is it a fact that the members of the ACOA board are allowed to approve large sums of money for themselves as directors of that board?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, again I will direct that question to the attention of Senator Murray.

Senator Bonnell: While checking into the ACOA board, could the acting leader also find out if it is true that the ACOA board is now under police investigation because of loan irregularities?

Senator Phillips: I will direct that question to Senator Murray. I have no knowledge of the allegation made by Senator Bonnell. This is the first time I have heard the rumour.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendment 3 and earlier amendment 5(a) to the Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 2(a) and (b) and earlier amendments 5(b) and (c);

That the Senate agree to the further amendment made by that House to clause 8; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, if I might, with consent, refer to Order No. 1 and Order No. 2, I would move that both of these motions be referred at this time to the

[Senator Hastings.]

Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I have had some discussions with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and it would appear, inasmuch as a committee report has been adopted by the Senate, that that particular committee report, approved in part by the House of Commons and rejected in part, now that it is back before the Senate, ought to be referred back to that committee so it can re-examine its own position and the comments made by the House of Commons.

I assume, if it is agreed that the motions be referred back to the committee, that the committee could sit on Tuesday next and be in a position to report within a short time thereafter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As honourable senators can imagine, I support what Senator Nurgitz has said. We did discuss the principle involved when a report from a committee recommending amendments is adopted by the Senate and sent to the House of Commons and then returned from the House of Commons with those amendments not accepted in full. I think, for reasons of courtesy or internal comity in the workings of the Senate, we ought to refer such messages to the committee concerned for comment. As Senator Nurgitz has said, these two messages deal with the subject of immigration and have been dealt with by the government, by the House of Commons and, to a large extent, by the Senate as companions. Because of that I think that we should deal with them together and send them both to the committee for comment. Senator Nurgitz is the deputy chairman of the committee. We have his opinion that the committee can meet early next week, and, if that committee has a report for the Senate, we can expect it then.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this motion be referred to the appropriate committee?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, motion referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REVISED MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 1(b), 3, 4, 9(a) and 11 to the Bill C-55, An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1(a), 2, 5, 6(a), 7, 8, 9(b) and (c), 10, 12(a) and (b);

That the Senate agree to the further amendments made by the House of Commons to clauses 14, 18 and 29;

That the Senate agree to the further amendment made by that House, adding a new clause after line 31 on page 56; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I understand that Order No. 2 is to receive the same treatment as Order No. 1, and that the motion is to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes. I thought we were dealing with them together.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, motion referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-72, An Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Guay, P.C.).

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I am pleased that the Government of Canada and the members of the opposition in the House of Commons have passed this bill so handsomely. I am pleased that it was presented by the Government of Canada. I was also very pleased with the comments made by the honourable senators who spoke in the debate on this bill yesterday. I should like particularly to mention the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Honourable Lowell Murray, who made an excellent speech, and also the Honourable Dalia Wood, who is our joint chairman on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. There are others, of course, who spoke very well.

[Translation]

Bill C-72, the Official Languages Bill now before the Senate, is the result of the maturing of one of the most distinctive characteristics of Canadian society, namely its language policy. In 1969, the first Official Languages Act launched a plan for institutional bilingualism that was unique in the world. Nearly twenty years later, it is appropriate that we should look at the legislation's strengths and weaknesses, adapt it to today's society and bring it into line with the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982. This new instrument should serve us well until Canada enters the twenty-first century.

When did the weaknesses of the first Official Languages Act become apparent? We recall the problems that arose after the reports of the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board in 1971 and 1975, when the issue was how the concept of bilingual districts should be implemented across Canada. Subsequently, the government, in its parliamentary resolution of 1973, specified the principles on the basis of which federal public servants had the right to perform their duties in the official language of their choice. There were also the judgments by the Federal Court in 1977 and 1978, in the case of the air traffic controllers in Quebec. At the time, the judges established that the Official Languages Act was declaratory, not executory, and that it had no primacy over other federal legislation. There were many complaints from three consecutive Commissioners of Official languages, Messrs. Spicer, Yalden and Fortier, as set forth in their annual reports. We could also analyze the Census data provided by Statistics Canada since the first Official Languages Act was passed and observe the gradual assimilation of language minorities in almost all Canadian provinces. We could read all the proceedings of the Joint Committee on Official Languages since 1980 and the many reports tabled by this committee in Parliament, and especially the report tabled in April 1983 which was in fact concerned with the weaknesses of the present legislation. Finally, we could name the many bills—more than thirty—that were tabled by members in the House of Commons for the purpose of improving this legislation and which died on the Order Paper. My point is that over the years, as the legislation was implemented, a number of weaknesses were revealed that went against the intent of the 1969 legislators, gaps that had to be closed to have a language policy that would be better able to “weather the storm”.

What new elements have been added to make Bill C-72 deserving of the support of members of the Senate? There are many, but I will mention only a few.

First, the new Official Languages Act would include a preamble, where the legislator would specify the entire scope of the bill in ten short paragraphs. This interpretive provision might prove very useful in the event of court challenges.

Second, section 2 of the new legislation would clearly define its three objectives which are: first, to ensure the equality of the official languages; second, to support the development of official language minorities and advance the equality of status and use of the English and French languages; and third, to set out the powers, duties and functions of federal institutions in this respect.

Third, in section 3 of the act we find definitions that would correct certain ambiguities contained in the present legislation. For instance, the definition of “federal institutions” would leave no doubts that the act shall apply to the Senate and to the House of Commons, which is not the case at present.

Fourth, in section 4, simultaneous interpretation of the debates and other proceedings would be provided under the Act instead of by an order of the House of Commons and a report of the Senate, as is currently the case.

Fifth, according to clause 10 of the bill, treaties and conventions between Canada and one or more other states would be authenticated in both official languages, and the same would apply to most classes of agreements between Canada and one or more provinces.

Sixth, Part III of the bill, which deals with the administration of justice, would remove any ambiguity and any restriction under the present law by recognizing that all Canadian citizens who must appear before a federal court anywhere in Canada have the right to use the official language of their choice without prejudice because they do not speak the other official language. Furthermore, section 16 of the new act would require federal courts other than the Supreme Court of Canada to make sure that the judge understands without an interpreter the official language in which the trial is conducted. This provision would correct a deficiency in the Charter, as interpreted in a recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada; according to this judgment, the right of the parties to use an official language before the courts does not imply that the presiding judge must understand that language—this in effect makes it a one-way right. Another interesting new provision in this part of the bill is that the Crown, when it is a party in a civil case, must use the official language chosen by the other parties, which would eliminate the strange situations, to say the least, that have occurred since the Charter was adopted. For example, we have heard the attorney for Canada pleading in English in a case dealing with French language rights as recognized in the Canadian Constitution.

Seventh, Part V of the bill recognizes that officials of federal institutions have the right to use French or English as a working language, subject to some rules of application. Now finally the 1973 parliamentary resolution is implemented in legislation. Section 36 defines the working environment favorable to the effective use of both official languages that the employer must provide. I cannot help but feel glad about this part of the bill, because I see that it offers the prospect of better job opportunities in the federal public service in bilingual regions in the West, especially Winnipeg, for graduates of our francophone institutions as well as students in French immersion programs.

Many do not realize that those students who are in the immersion programs in Winnipeg—I am speaking only of Winnipeg—number well over 3,000 today, closer to 4,000, and not one of those is French. Their parents are people who are particularly interested to see that their children learn the two languages properly.

I must however deplore that the Winnipeg region is not mentioned in the Treasury Board circular that lists the regions that have been designated bilingual for language of work. I hope that the government will take steps to correct that situation through the regulatory powers provided to that effect.

Eighth, I would be remiss if I did not mention Part VII of the bill, an important addition that deals with the advancement of English and French. Having just recently attended a general meeting of Manitoban francophonie, I was able to note firsthand the needs of the minority to which I belong and the enormous amount of effort expended by volunteers in an array of associations fighting the effects of assimilation and working to develop the necessary infrastructure to maintain that linguistic minority. Although the past may have been marred by a series of measures designed to deprive us of that infrastructure, we hope that the future will give rise to measures that will help that minority flourish, for without it our country's language policy would be pointless. That is why I feel it is of primordial importance that the federal government, through the Secretary of State Department, support minorities, be they anglophone or francophone, by the measures set out in clause 43 of the bill. I would add that that part of the legislation is made even more outstandingly important by the fact that the most recent constitutional accords were silent on the role of the federal government in the promotion of linguistic minorities.

Ninth, Part IX of the bill which deals with the role of the Commissioner of Official Languages, also adds a few elements to the existing act. For instance, certain protections already granted by the Access to Information Act to the Information Commissioner and to persons acting on her behalf are extended to the Commissioner of Official Languages and to persons acting on his behalf, such as the right not to be compelled to appear as a witness and protection against criminal or civil proceedings. The bill thus tends to make the prerogatives of these two ombudsmen more similar, as they play similar roles in the name of the Canadian government.

Tenth, one of the weaknesses of the existing act is that it is declaratory rather than executory. Clause 77 of Bill C-72 bridges the gap by making provision for court remedy enabling any Canadian citizen whose rights have been infringed to seek redress, as may be deemed fair and appropriate by the court.

Eleventh, finally, another weakness of the current statute would be eliminated by clause 82 which states that, with respect to Parts I to V provisions, the Official Languages Act would have primacy over any other federal legislation. This provision of the new act would give it a quasi-constitutional character and thus make it more compatible with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

So those are eleven reasons which make me hope that the Senate will deal quickly with Bill C-72 so that the departments responsible for implementing the legislation might get the ball rolling. We can expect the Department of Justice, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury Board to play a role in the implementation of this act, as will the Commissioner of Official Languages and the Public Service Commission. Indeed the bill provides that these organizations periodically report to Parliament on their activities: the Secretary of State, the President of the Treasury Board, and the Commissioner of Official Languages would be expected to table an annual report in Parliament with respect to measures which have been taken pursuant to the act.

For eight years now, ever since the Joint Committee on Official Languages has been in existence, I have had the pleasure of being a member and representative of the Senate. Therefore I was able to see for myself the weaknesses of the existing legislation as it relates to the official languages program within the Public Service and to the situation of official language minorities in Canada. I was also able to see that opposition to the bill from such groups as the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada comes from very few people of the English-speaking majority. As a matter of fact, you may have seen the kind of publicity they resort to, a shameful and misrepresentation-ridden ad published in a number of newspapers under the heading "Wake up Canada, Racism Runs Rampant on Parliament Hill".

As a very active and very present representative on Parliament Hill for 20 years now, I can assure you that what I see every day is quite the opposite—ever wider acceptance of the concept of Canada's linguistic duality. That is why I support any legislative and regulatory measure which better defines our duality. Honourable senators, that is why I support Bill C-72.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave us a clear and highly detailed explanation of the background and history of this legislation which, as we know full well, amends the Official Languages Act. It is therefore an extension of the scope of the principles set forth in that legislation.

I do not think it would be useful for me or, if I may say so, anyone else to elaborate on the careful research that he obviously put into his speech.

Having been a member of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism—the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission—I feel constrained to add a few comments, not to correct what he had to say but to give my reaction to this legislation from that perspective.

My first statement must be that I support it. It is an extension of the principles that were set out in the first and third books of the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism and, as such, deserves the support of all Canadians.

Next I will walk through the bill and raise some questions. As to the bill representing an extension of the principles set out in the first book of the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, senators may notice that this bill is about twice the length of the 1969 Official Languages Act. I am informed that much of the bulk of the present bill is due to incorporating administrative practices and policies that have been in place for years.

After serving as a member of the royal commission, I was retained by the first Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Keith Spicer, as his legal adviser. I served not as a member of the Civil Service but as an independent consultant to him for the full length of his term.

I should like to take this opportunity to say something about the administration of Mr. Spicer. I was able to observe it from the perspective of a member of the commission. I was able to observe it at close range because of my role with him as legal adviser. Of course, I was also able to observe it as a member of the public. I must congratulate him and express my thanks, from those three perspectives, for what I perceive as a brilliant and successful launching of this important, and to some extent revolutionary, legislation.

Mr. Spicer had an excellent understanding of the principles behind the bill. He understands the two languages and the two cultures very well. He is very well educated in both. He is the most fully bilingual Canadian I have ever met—certainly the most fully bilingual anglophone—partly because of his unusual understanding of the culture of French Canada and the culture of France.

And I do not wish to be stingy with my congratulations to his successor, Mr. Yalden, who very successfully added his own cachet to the régime, nor to the present commissioner, D'Iberville Fortier, who, as evidenced very clearly by this legislation, is following in that same evolutionary tradition.

When I was legal adviser to Mr. Spicer, a good deal of effort was spent in the last few years of his term attempting to obtain amendments to the legislation, some of them now being realized in the legislation before us. It was part of the commissioner's duty, as I recall it, under the present act to make recommendations for amendments, and all commissioners have done so. Certainly, we cannot let this legislation pass without saying that Mr. Fortier has presided over the most extensive of those amendments and, of course, has been responsible for many of them, as have members of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages and the joint chairman, Senator Wood.
